

BLACK ARROW, THE AVENGER.

BEADLE AND COMPANY, 98 WILLIAM STREET NEW YORK.
Am. News Co., 119 & 121 Nassau St., N. Y.

Mayne Reid Outdone!

We have the pleasure of introducing to the one hundred thousand regular readers of the "Standard Favorites,"

Beadle's Dime Novels,

in the issue of Tuesday, March 28 (No. 226) a new writer, and a romance as beautiful, strange and striking as any thing that ever fell from the prolific pen of that "Wizard of Border Story," Captain Mayne Reid, with whom the writer of this now announced work was long associated, viz.:

THE MUSTANG-HUNTERS:

OR.

The Beautiful Amazon of the Hidden Valley

A TALE OF THE STAKED PLAINS.

BY FREDERICK WHITTAKER.

No.

The scene of this novel is in North-western Texas, in the celebrated Llano Estacado or Staked Plains—a region of arid waste, over which even the fierce Comanche rides with dread. Lying between the fastnesses of the Grand Sierras, it is rarely reached by adventurers; hence has become a favorite haunt of the WILD Horses or Mustangs of the Plains, whose fleetness, hardiness and beauty are renowned.

A Black Mustang, of astonishing speed, spirit, and splendor of bearing, lures a young hunter to its pursuit, in which he is assisted by a real Texan Ranger and Hunter, and by a young desperado, whose thirst for a foeman's blood leads him ever into the Comanche country, whence that foe has fled.

These three meet with a marvelous experience in that almost unknown waste-meet not only savages but a civilization quite dazzling to their astonished vision, and out of this meeting springs a life-struggle and a love tale that hold the reader in thrall to the end.

It is a romance well worthy the series which has given so many noted books to current American literature; and will meet with great favor at the hands of our immense audience of constant readers.

BEADLE'S DIME Novels are always kept in stock by dealers, of whom all back numbers and all current issues can be obtained; or they are sent, post-paid, to any address, on receipt of price, Ten Cents each.

BEADLE AND COMPANY, Publishers,

98 William Street, New York.

BLACK ARROW, THE AVENGER;

JUDGE LYNCH ON THE BORDER.

with the ball the state of the best of the provide of heading the test of the provide state to be Estered according to Act of Congress, in the scar 1811. ?.

BELLE AND COMPANY, BY EDWARD WILLETT,

Author of the following Dime Novels:

119. THE FIVE CHAMPIONS. | 159. SNOW-BIRD.

132 OLD HONESTY.

139. THE EORDER FOES. 205. THE GRAY SCALP.

110. THE HIDDEN HOME (- 145) THE MOUNTAINEER.

114. NED STARLING. 149. THE HUNTER'S PLEDGE

125. THE HUNTED LIFE. 170. BORDER AVENGERS.

187. THE OUTLAWS PLOT.

212. SILVERSPUR.

NEW YORK: BEADLE AND COMPANY, PUBLISHERS, 98 WILLIAM STREET.

BEACK ARROW, THE AVENCER;

JUDGE LYNCH ON THE BORDER.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1871, by BEADLE AND COMPANY, In the office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

AND THE PROPERTY OF AND AND STREET AND STREET OF STREET AND STREET

PEADLE AND COMPANY, PUBLISHERS,

" It's a good enough answer, I think will not be the first time that one of us has been jet off from a job,"

True enough, in case of sickness, or some other good rea-BLACK ARROW, THE AVENGER.

the me, and so has his wife They have treated me as if I was

"I am not afferid to tell my reason, Captain Roder, and I of Bildamill ma I has RODER'S GANG. 0002 as againd account a

THE scene is Texas; the time is somewhat less than half a century ago.

A young man stood with his back against a tree, at the edge of a grove of heavy timber. A tall young man, longlimbed, broad-shouldered and athletic, with no superfluous flesh upon his frame, which had been hardened and tempered by the labor and exposure of the chase. Not a handsome young man, and yet by no means ill-looking, with bright, keen eyes, and a daring, self-reliant expression of countenance. He was dressed in a coarse homespun hunting-shirt, with leggins and moccasins of deer-skin, and a felt hat, considerably worse for wear. Both his hands grasped the barrel of his rifle, the butt of which stood on the ground between his feet, and he gazed steadily, almost fiercely, at the group of seven men who confronted him.

In the group were two Mexicans and one Irishman, and the others were apparently Americans. There was no similarity in their attire, except that there was hardly a garment among them that was not more or less dilapidated. There was no similarity of form or feature; but all wore the same wild, restless, reckless, dogged look, hinting strongly at a companionship in crime. All were armed, and all were looking at the young man before them, with an expression in which displeasure was strongly mixed with wonder.

"I won't do it, boys, and that's enough," said he.

must let me off from this."

"We can't take such an answer as that, Ben Blood, and you know it," replied a stout, grizzly-bearded man, whose look and tone of authority showed that he was the leader of the party.

"It's a good enough answer, I think. This will not be the first time that one of us has been let off from a job."

"True enough, in case of sickness, or some other good reason; but you have given no reason, and your conduct looks suspicious. I am afraid you have some reason that won't bear telling."

"I am not afraid to tell my reason, Captain Roder, and I am not ashamed of it. Colonel Landry has been very kind to me, and so has his wife. They have treated me as if I was a human being, as good as themselves, and I am thankful to them. I can't mix in any thing that is to injure them."

"Don't press him, captain. We all know that the colonel's daughter is a very pretty girl." hoote dam

The last speaker was a young man who might have been called handsome, if the expression of his countenance had not been at times decidedly unpleasant. As he then spoke, he accompanied the remark with a sneering and malevolent glance at Ben Blood. His hair was coul-black and curling; but his eyes were blue, with a glitter like that of burnished steel. His personal appearance indicated that he paid as much attention to it as his purse and position would permit, and it was this trait that had procured for him the sobriquet of Fancy Charley, the only name by which he was known among his companions.

"It's not the girl, Charley," replied Roder. "Ben Blood don't fly at that kind of game."

"I have been thinking, Ben, for some time, that you are getting tired of us, that you want to quit us."

"I am willing to own that I am tired of this kind of life. I would feel better, I know, if I could settle down somewhere and behave myself, and live like white folks."

Do you mean to say that we are not white folks?"

"I have heard somewhere of men whose hands were against everybody, and everybody's hands against them. That's the kind of folks we are-too much like red Injuns-and I would like to live in peace with the world."

"Do you remember your oath?"

"I remember it well enough, and I don't expect to break It; but it didn't bind me to keep at this business all my "You know what will happen to the man who betrays us."

"I have not betrayed anybody, and I don't mean to, when I do, it will be time enough to talk about that. I don't want any thing to do with this job, and I won't have any thing to do with it, and that I say plainly, once for all."

"We will not press you, Ben, and you may go your way; but you had better be careful which way you go. When a man gets tired of us and our ways, the next thing I look for is, to see him turn traitor; but he had better not do that. Come, boys!"

The seven men turned and went away, without any more words, leaving Ben Blood standing with his back against a tree. He looked after them until they were out of sight, and then, leaning his head on his hands that grasped the muzzle of his rifle, stood silent and motionless for some minutes.

"I'll do it?" he said at last, raising his head with an air of determination. They may call me a traitor, if they find me out, and may do what they please; but I am quit of them from this day on."

He walked away at a swinging pace, and half an hour's travel brought him to a mansion which was a strange but not unpleasing compound of old and new styles of architecture, the main building being constructed of stone, but nearly concealed by wooden additions and extensions. In fact, it was Mexico, overlaid with the United States.

He hesitated a moment, before he opened the gate that led into the inclosure, and then stepped quickly to the house. A fine-looking gentleman, somewhat past middle age, who was sitting on the veranda with a paper in his hand, looked up as the hunter closed the gate.

"Glad to see you, Ben Blood," he said, as he rose from his seat. "Come in and take a chair. Wife! Rose! Here is our hunter friend come back I'

A beautiful girl of sixteen, with large dark eyes and wavy masses of black hair ran out on the veranda, followed more slowly by a matronly lady.

"I am so glad!" exclaimed the girl. "I have been dying to see somebody."

"Perhaps, Rose, you are dying to get another benutiful panther-skin or some more feathers of the blue heron. For my part, I am tired of salt meat, and long for some juicy venison; but my wife won't let me hunt, as she fears that my precious health would suffer. Sit down, Ben Blood, and tell me when you will undertake a grand hunt for the benefit of this starving family.

"I can't sit down, Colonel Landry," replied the hunter, "as I have no time to stay. I can't hunt for you to-day, and am afraid that I can never hunt for you any more. I have come on a business errand, and I must tell my errand and go."

"What is the matter, my friend? You look troubled. It must be something serious. Speak plainly. Perhaps I can help you."

"It is a matter that concerns yourself, Colonel Landry. I had rather speak to you alone, if you please."

"Very well. Take Rose into the house, my dear. Now, Ben Blood, let me know what the matter is."

Paul Roder and his gang are after you.

"Roder's gang! What does this mean? What do they want? What grudge have they against me?"

"They want plunder, sir, if nothing worse, and there's a grudge out, too. Don't you remember the part you took against that half-breed fellow, who was caught stealing horses?"

Yes."

Yes."

"He was one of Roder's gang, and that gives them a grudge," show add become ad an analysis and that gives them a

"Are you sure that they have threatened me, Ben Blood? When do they mean to come?"

"I know that they are after you, and that they will come to-night."

"I can't defend the place against them, and I must run away. What a country is this, where a man's life and property are at the mercy of a gang of outlaws! If there is not a change for the better before long, I must leave Texas. But I must do the best I can now. We will pack up such things as we can carry, and will go to Ferguson's ranch. How is it, Ben Blood, that you know so much about Roder's gang? Don't tell me unless you are willing to."

"I have no objection to telling you now; but I had rather the ladies wouldn't know it. I belong to that gang, Colonel

Landry That is, I did belong to it; untill this morning. I have quit them, and with never have any thing to do with precious hours that might have placed him out of miaga moult

"If they should find out that you have told me about this matter it would be apt to go hard with your beggets oil neilw

"It might; but I mean to leave the country. I must say good-by to you. Colonel Landry, and I hope you will tell the ladies that I wish them well. I have a fine panther-skin for Miss Rose, which I will try to send to her." "I'm of "Never mind it. Ben. II will tell them that you risked your life for us. It will not be safe for you to stay in the country after this. If you want any money, just name it to Landry's house. It was easy enough to goes, then, why illiem

"I want nothing, Colonel Landry, but your good-will, if you can give litito mell'sagraini "vehado depone s'indT "

"You have my best wishes, my friend, and I bid you God You have been wied and sentenced already, Ben Blood, "besque

The hunter accepted the offered hand of Colonel Landry, and pressed it warmly. He then turned quickly away, and was soon out of sight of the mansion.

Ben Blood's next stopping place was at a rude little cabin in the timber. It was his own; he had built it that he might have a shelter when resting from his hunting excursions. It was a poor, cramped up affair; but it was his home, and he sighed as he thought of leaving it. Against the wall was stretched a large and splendid panther skin. This he took down, and set at work diligently to dress it boildobars body and roboil law!

To dress a fine skin, and to dress it neatly and well, is a task that requires considerable time, as well as labor and skill. The hunter was obliged to build a fire, in order to expedite his work. In the intervals of his task, while he was waiting for the skin to dry, he occupied himself in preparing food for his present needs and for his journey.

The night was well advanced when he had finished dressing the skin to his satisfaction, and had stretched it before the fire for a last drying. As it was quite dark, and he was weary, he concluded to sleep a few hours, and to start on his journey with the first light of the morning. He stretched himself out on a blanket in the corner of his cabin, and was soon asleep.

It would have been well for Ben Blood if he had taken the advice of Colonel Landry, and had "never minded" the panther-skin. He lost, in dressing it for Rose Landry, several precious hours that might have placed him out of the reach of the remorseless and revengeful Roder's gang. As it was, when he stepped out of his cabin-door, in the gray of the early morning, he was at once surrounded and seized by them.

"I suppose you know well enough what's the matter," said Fancy Charley, sneering maliciously while he addressed the captive. "If you don't, we do, and that's enough for us. Were you such a fool as not to think that you would be watched, after what you said yesterday morning? You were well watched, and you were seen to go straight to Colonel Landry's house. It was easy enough to guess, then, why there was nobody at home when we called there last night."

"That's enough, Charley," interposed Paul Roder. "He knows that he is guilty, and I reckon he won't try to deny it. You have been tried and sentenced already, Ben Blood. You said, yesterday morning, that it would be time enough to talk about traitors when you had betrayed anybody. You will see that we don't talk much about such things—we act. Is there any thing you want to say, before you are punished?"

The prisoner was silent in an are and sew all and and "He has nothing to say, and it is well for him that he holds his tongue. Lead him into the woods, Charley, and let him have his punishment. I reckon he will never try to betray Roder's gang again."

Paul Roder laughed sardonically, and his laugh was echoed by all except the prisoner, who, guarded by two of the gang, was led forward, silent and unresisting.

The hunter was chilged to build a me, in order to expedite his work. In the intervals of his task while he was waiting for the skin to thry, he occupied himself in preparing food for his preparing food for his preparing food for his preparing food for

The skin to his satisfaction, and had stretched it before the fire the far a last drying. As it was quite dark, and he was weary, he concluded to steep a tow hours, and to start on his journey with the first light of the morning. He stretched himself out on a blanket is the corner of his cabin, and was so a asleep.

ads made been bed if booth nell for Hen Blood if he had taken the hie't be had manufactured to sait, his organiana bail post-

e : weare a si tee semb of de removement la teell rai

AN APPRAY.

Two years have clapsed since Ben Blood was visited with the displeasure of the Roder gang. Settlers have been pouring into Texas, and some portions of the new republic (which is already kneeking for admission at the door of the Great R public may be regarded as civilized; but the greater part is wild runs, distitute of law, a refage for criminals, a paradise of evil-doors.

A loard sharty, whitewashed, is situated on a prairie, near a grove of timber. It is not the only board sharty in sight; for there are several other such structures, none of them whitewashed, and there are two more pretentions buildings, partially plated, with their gable-ends on the street carried up so as to show a false front, an easily discovered sham which has been fastionable in many ways.

The sheaty which was first mentioned is more interesting at the moment than the two pretentions stores and the chard chard shantles. To judge by the numbers who are clustered in and about it, it might be supposed to be the numbers of the settlement, which is known, temporarily, by the name of March's Settlement. The reason for this absorbing interest is found in the digenerate nature of unregenerate than; the building not only contains a whicky-shop, but a mediate in fall black.

They dealer at the route table, and the proprieter of the catalog is the at young man of hands one features, but with a sill or and unplea and expression. His dress was costly, but hereby element. A diamond pin sparkled in his necktie, done at stable a formal his shirt become, and diamond rines plateau for his theory sall of which may have been real, but were more probably parts. He was known as Caurles St. Calle, a name which may have been a name by which he was christened (if he ever underwent that coronony); but it might have been a name which he had manufactured to suit his appearance and pesi-

There were some forty or fifty men in and about the building. Most of them were rough in dress and in manners; a few were flashily attired, and fewer still had the appearance of gentlemen. Of this motley group we will at present notice only two.

One sat near the door, in a corner of the room, at the en! of a long bench, and was evidently a looker-on, taking no interest in the game or in the commodities that were dispense! at the bar. He was a tail and well-formed man, showing a good museular development. His heavily beard I fare was not handsome, and was rendered really unly by a sour on it's left check, extending from the eye to the corner of the mouth, and by the absence of his right eye. Netther a scar nor a missing eye was a very remarkable feature in Texas at that time, as cutting and googing were among the first of the fine arts introduced by American civilization; but this scar was a livid, unpleasant scar, and there was a cavernous eavity where the eye should have been. In justice to the stranger it nast he said that he wore a black patch, or shale, over the later. feature; but he was in the habit of lifting it, now and then, as if the cavity needed air. He was dresed in their brick bridcloth and a black felt lest, his court being a single breeze garment, buttoning up to the chin. This weuld have given Lim the appearance of a stray colporteur, or the mill norvef some New-Light church, had not its effects been counteracted by his very swarthy complexion, and by his alter hant black hair, which fell down his shoullers in will and bray marris. As this man was a stranger in March's S tilem ut, we will not give his name, unless it shall sait his own place we to the trtion it.

The other person to be noticed occupied a seed nor the stranger, a few steps from the provided he did not he had he it a grave with great interest, although he did not porticipate in the betting. He was, apparently, a few years he call his majority, and was didded by a hand only star note, with a frach, open countenance, and a good-humored, though fearless and resolute expression. He was neatly and that fully dread, in a brown out-away cost and gray pantalooms, with a plain gold watch-guard crossing his breast. His light hair was covered with a cloth cap. A silky mustache just shaded his upper lip. This young gentleman was George Warner, a late arrival from "the States." He was staying at the plantation of Colonel Landry, near March's Settlement, and was supposed, in the slang of the settlement, to be "sweet on" the colonel's very pretty daughter.

As George Warner sat watching the game of monté, there came to him a biz, bony, rough, brutal-looking fellow, who had "hoisted in" as much blue ruin as he could conveniently starger under, and whose belligeren propensicies were thereby exerted to such a degree, that it became necessary to his peace of mind to pick a quarrel with somebody.

This individual pounced upon Warner for his subject, believing him to be a stranger and lawful game. He planted himself in front of the young gentleman, standing wide apart, that he might better preserve his balance, and commenced his warlike overtures by flourishing his fist in Warner's face.

"I say, young chap!" he exclaimed, "I am the best man in this neck of woods, by a long jump!"

Warner glanced at him in silence, and continued to watch the game.

"I say!—you young cuss!—I am a speakin' to you. Why den't you listen to me?"

"What do you want?" asked Warner, looking up.

by a long jump." I have best man in this hyar neck of timmer, Good men are so scarce, and raseals are so planty, that it gives me great pleasure to meet such a paragon as yourself."

"I've hourd a heap of cuss talk, and have been called abundance of hard names; but I'll be everlastin'ly dozoned if this ain't the first time I was over called a pollygon. What do you must by that, you little cuss?? This is 't lor dozon't I'll a col

"I mean that I am glad to meet such a good man in this country. You are a Christian, of course, a pious man, with to have in you—in fact, a rara aris in terra."

talk Dutch to me. You've got to take that back, you con-

"I am afraid that you are not as good a man as you boast yourself to be," replied Warner, with a very perceptible sneer, and Warner, with a very perceptible sneer, and Warner, and the control of the co

"I can jest whip any man in this neck of timmer, and hyur goes to smash your purty pictur'!"

The young gentleman arose quickly from his seat, catching on his left arm the blow that was intended for his head, and launching out his right like a catapult. The blow was a center shot, striking the ruffian under the left eye, starting the blood in a stream, and felling him like an ox. As the fullen man did not move, Warner turned to leave the room.

This little by-play was hardly worth notice in such a place and in such company. The monté players continue l'their gune without noticing what had happened, and the lour rers, with one exception, merely glance l'at the fracus, without taking any further interest in it.

The one exception was a sturdy, thick-set men, with grizzled hair and board, who drew a bowie-knite, and rushed at Warner with vengeful intent. The young gentleman, taken of his guard, would probably have fallen a victim to the keen edge of the murderous knife, had it not been for the prampt intervention of the stranger in broadcloth. This man stopped the career of the assailant by fastening a firm grip on the older of his coat. He then swung him around, as if he had been a boy, and whirled him out at the door, where he fell on his face. He picked up him elf and his knife, and walked away after casting back a malicious glance into the rolar. The fallen rulian also arose, and quietly slinked away.

"I reston you had better be getting away from here, stranger," said one who had the appearance of a gentleman, stepping up to the man in broadcloth. "That was Paul Roder, and the man who was knocked down was one of his gent."

"Roder's gang!" ejaculated the stranger, with a peculiar look. "I have heard that they are dangerous men."

"That's just what they are. They have gone to arm themsolves and to get their friends. They may double towns on you and use you upon the town to the control of the contr

"Thank you. I had better be moving, I suppose. If I should have to fight, I had rather fight on ground of my own choosing."

With these words the stranger stepped out of the door.

George Warner, after waiting a few moments, also left the shanty.

The road that he followed, leading toward the north-east, took him through a grove of heavy timber, and it was nearly dask when he entered the timber. He had got about three hundred yards from the shanty, when he caught sight of three men before him. Two of them he recognized as Paul Roder and his late assailant. They were walking rapidly, and Warner conjectured that it was their intention to overtake the stranger who had so opportunely come to his assistance. He turned off into the timber, determined to keep the men in view, and to defeat their object if possible.

He had nearly caught up with them, when he was stopped, as well as they, by a bail in front.

"Halt there!" sail the voice. "If you come a step further, Paul Roller, you are a dead man. I have got a bead on you, and will drop you in your tracks."

Roler looked in the direction from which the voice proceeded, and Grerge Warner also looked. He saw a ride-barrilled against the trank of a large tree, and he know that the man who held it was well covered. He thought it best to take part in the parley, and stepped behind a tree, drawing a pair of D rringer pistols.

"Go back, Paul Roler!" said the stranger. "You have no care to lemt me, and it is not a safe thing to do. You had Letter take fair warning."

"That's a fact, Paul Rober!' said Warner. "If that ritle is not enough, my Derringers are safe for two of you. You had been take fair warning and go."

The radians were evidently taken aback. After whispering tegether, they turned and walked back toward the softlem at Warner, fearing treachery, kept his tree between him and them, and the ritle-barrel was pointed at them until they were out of sight. Then the young gentleman stepped out into the road, and joined the stranger.

"I think we will not be troubled any more by those resple to-n'ght," he said.

Perlane net; but I mean to keep one of my eyes in the back of my bead."

- "I must thank you for coming to my rescue when Paul Roler drew his knife against me. He would have killed me, I think, if you had not interfered."
- " He looked as if he meant to; but you don't owe me any thanks for that."
- "It was because you helped me that Roder followed you to kill you. He would hardly dare to harm me, except in a m>ment of passion, as I have influential friends here; but you are a stranger. You have not been long in the neighborhood, I suppose" vo or neglig mi arvir com in him i but

" Not long."

- "Have you any friends here?"
- "None that I know of. But that's no matter. There's a chance that I may turn out to be too much for Paul Roder, myself, before I am done with him."
- "He is a dangerous man, and his gang is the terror of the country."
  - "All things have an end, and their time may come."
- "I will be glad if you will allow me to call myself your friend, and I hope you will not think me inquisitive if I ask you where you mean to stop to-night.'
- "To stop? You want to know where I mean to camp? That's more than I know myself. I have a horse not far from here, and we generally camp near wood and water."
  - "I will take it as favor if you will go leane with me."
- "Home is a word I scarcely know the meaning of. Where do you live?"
- "With Golonel Landry. His plantation is not a quarter of a mile from here."
- "I will go there with you, if you wish. I have heard that Colonel Landry is a good man, and I would be glad to see him. But I must first go and get my horse."
- "I will go with you. And now, as we have become so far acquainted, I must ask your name."
- "My name is Nathaniel Whetstone, and I have generally been called Nat Whetstone. What is yours?'
  - "George Warner."

Nat Whet-tone started, and looked so strangely at his compartion, that the latter asked him if the name was familiar to him."

"Not familiar; but I've heard it somewhere. Are you from the States?"

"From' Mississippi," on "office Control on formal In "Old Missi-sippi! It's a fine State, I've heard, and I should like mightily to see it. I am glad that I have met you, George Warner, and I will go with you to Colonel Landry's house right willingly, if you will walk with me to get my horse."

George Warner wondered at the strange language and conduct of his companion, but followed him without further re-murk.

They had been walking in the road during their conversation; but at this point they turned off into the woods. Whatstone led the way to a ravine in which his horse was picketed feeling on the plentiful grass. Warner noticed that the horse was a mustang, and that the saddle on his back was an Indian saddle; but there was nothing unusual in these particulars.

Whetstone unpicketed the horse, coiled and secured his lariat, to k the bridle in his hand, and walked with his companion to Colonal Landry's plantation.

in it says to prompt in the part tile of the company of the compan

CHAPTER III. WHO WAS BEN BLOOD?

er i .

In was dark when George Warner and his new friend reached the mansion of Colonel Landry; but there were lights in the win lows, and voices of welcome were heard in response to the young gentleman's hail.

A put cring of feet was heard on the walk, as a girl ran down to meet the lite comer. It was Rose Landry, with a beauty more nutural and attractive than had been hers two years before, and with a love-light in her eyes which Nat Whetstone, Iranzed and ugly as he was, could not fail to observe and approvise.

Why, George! dear George!" she excluimed. "Why roug and I have worried myself meanly to death"

Her voice dropped as she saw the stranger, and sice stranger and blushed.

"I have been detained a little," replied Warner; "but I am safe and sound, as you see." ...

He called a negro boy, to whom he gave Whetstone's horse in charge, and led the way to the house. Rese preceded them, looking back every now and then, as if to make sure that her lover was really safe.

Colonel Landry and his wife were met in the sitting-toom, two years older than when we made their acquaintance; but showing no evidence in their appearance of the lapse of two years.

years.

years.

years.

years.

Warner introduced his friend, who went through the coremony of introduction rather awkwardly, and Mrs. Landry informed them that supper was ready and waiting. George declared that he had had nothing to eat since breakful, and that he doubted whether his friend had fared any better. The young gentleman proved the truth of his statement, as regarded himself, by enting as if he was famished; but Wheestone appeared to have but little app tite, and his eyes or eyes left straying around the table, resting, with a pseculiar expression, now on Colonel Landry and his wife, and then on Research to deorge Warner. He spoke only when he was speken to using his words with rare economy, and vouchsaing little information in reply to the questions that were a like of to him.

Colonel Landry, if he had expressed his epinion, would then have said that he did not like the book of the strater; his wife did not approve of Whetstone's style of sturing about the table; and Role considered him an unpleasant, if not a frightful object, especially when he lifted the patential strongled the cavity of his right eyes of age, to the cavity of his right eyes of age, to the cavity of his right eyes of age, to the cavity of his right eyes.

George Warner, however, was load in the praise of his also frien! He related his adventure at St. Chiris shouly, and deduced that his life would have been but, if it had not be a for Whet ton's prompt and effected aid. How turn of post and trembled at this normation, and, as George Commental like stranger, boked upon him with more favorable eyes; but her father shook his head's lenally.

"I am glad that you are safe, George," he said, " and am deeply grateful to Mr. Whetstone for having rescued you from such a danger. I am only sorry that the necessity should have occurred. I feel it my duty to say that that saloon, as some people call it, is not a proper place for a young gentleman, and particularly for your father's son. I am sure, if he were living, that he would be sorry to hear that you had entered such a place? [satisfy your father's son.]

"But I was neither gambling or drinking, sir. I was only looking on."

"I am glad of that; but I am bound to believe that you had no business there. There are always roughs and drunken men at such a place, and there is always danger of a collision."

"This is a rough country, sir, and we are obliged to a cocite with many rough people. If I should not do so, they we all call me 'stuck-up,' and wo ld hate me. It seems to me that it is best to keep on good terms with them, and to mingle with them on something like a footing of equality. Some of the best men in the settlement were there to day."

George, that would take you to such a place. Your experience has shown you that there is danger of a collision, and your life has been, as you a limit, in immining peril. You have come out safely so far; but I am afraid the trouble is not enled. There is no telling to what that affray may lead. Rolar's gang are dangerous men."

"Very trac, sir; but I am sure that I will not knackle to them. It is strange that they have never molested you. I and same that they distince you."

"They have never troubled me but once," replied Colonel Ladity, with a me desitation. "That was about two years are. They the atened to pay me a visit, and did so; but they for their area. I had been warred of their intention by a han'r monel Een Elect."

G "g" Warner started, and Na: What's " looked up.

was bell in a volument the young gentleman. "Who

I have told you his name, and I know little more about him. He was a hunter, a poor follow to whom I had taken a liking, and his friendship for me, I suppose, was the cause of his death." a The constant party the The House

" How was that ?"

"It seems that he was one of Roder's gang, although he had determined to quit them, as he told me when he warned me of their intentions against me. I suppose they discovered, or suspected what he had done, and that they killed him as a punishment for his treachery. I left the plantation after the warning, because I was unable to resist them, but returned with a band of men and discovered that they had plundered my house. I went to Blood's cabin, and found it deserted: I supposed that he had left the country, as he had said he meant to do, and I would have been satisfied, if we had not perceived a number of tracks about the door. We followed the tracks into the woods, and there we found marks of a scuffle and a pool of blood, leaving us in no doubt that the poor fellow had been taken out of his cabin and murdered."

" Was nothing done about it?" asked Warner.

"What could be done? We could trace the crime to no one. We could not even find the body. Besides, Roder's gang were too powerful for the law at that time, and I must confess that they don't seem to have grown much weaker."

"The name of that hunter is not a singular one, Colonel Landry, nor is it a common name. I wish you would describe him to me."

"Do you fancy that you may have met the man?"

"I had a half-brother named Ben Blood."

Colonel Landry's countenance showed his surprise, and Nat Whetstone bent one of his peculiar glances upon the young gentleman.

"I have never mentioned him to you, sir. You know that my mother was a widow when my father married her; but you may not have known that she had a son living. That son was Ben Blood, and he would be, if living, some seven or eight years older than I am. He became involved in a love affair, in which he had a rival, and the consequence was a quarrel and a fight. Ben stabbed his rival, left him for dead, and ran away. The wounded man recovered; but we heard nothing more of Ben, from that day to this."

"My hunter friend was a young man," said Colonel Landry,

"but had seen fully twenty-five years, I think. He was tall and well-made, not ill-looking, and decidedly not handsome. He had a good manner and a fair share of intelligence."

"It is more than possible that he was my brother; but I was quite young when Ben left Mississippi, and I do not remember him well. I know that I loved him because he was my mother's so, and my love for her was very great. Are you sure that the hunter was killed?"

"There can hardly be a doubt of it. Roder's gang are not men who do things by halves. It is quite certain that they took him out of his cabin. He had promised a panther-skin to Rose, and we found it there, newly dressed. I am afraid he had been working on it when he ought to have been making his escape. There it hangs, on the wall. There is a mournful interest attached to it, and Rose could not be induced to part with it?"

All rose from the table, and Whetstone walked to the wall, took down the panther-skin and examined it.

"I'll warrant that you found this stretched before a fire," he said. To let a stretched before a fire,"

"I have had some experience in dressing skins, and I can see that the work on this was not quite finished. It should have been well rubbed and softened after it had dried. If the young lady will permit me, I will put the skin in order for her."

"I am much obliged to you," replied Rose; "but I keep it in remembrance of poor Ben Blood, and I had rather have it just as it left his hands."

"If he was alive, Miss, and could hear you say that, he would be a proud man."

There was a cloud over George Warner that night. He asked Colonel Landry many questions concerning the murdered Ben Blood, and became convinced that the victim of the vengeance of Roder's gang was none other than his missing half-brother. The more he thought and spoke upon this subject, the more gloomy he became, and even the gentle blandishments of Rose could not rouse him from his melancholy.

"Ben Blood was my mother's son," he said, " and I loved.

him as if he was my own brother. He was never bad at heart, although he may have been in some way connected with a band of desperadoes. He fit himself to be an outlaw, not knowing that the man had survived whom he thought he had killed. If it is true—and I will find out in one way or another, whether it is true or not—that he was murdered by Roder's gang, I swear upon Rose's panther-skin—a sacred relic now—that I will avenge his death upon them!"

"Be careful what you say," suggested Colonel Landry.

"There is a stranger here."

"It is true that I am a stranger," said Nat Whetstone; "but, if the young gentleman is in earnest, and if Le will accept my aid, I will help him in this matter.'

" I do not regard you as a stranger," replied George. "I thank you for your offer and gladly accept it."

"I hope you will not run i to danger," said the colonel.
"Remeniter Rose?" oggateted if has plain a little at the

"I will remember Rose, sir, and I will act cautiously and prudently. The time is coming when that gang of out-torouts will no longer be a terror to peaceable citizens. Other neighborhoods have had vigilance committees, and we will have ours. In fact, Colonel Landry, it is nearly ready to act, and the members will expect your sympathy and aid."

Colonel Landry looked astonished, but made no reply, and soon all retired for the night, Whetstone occupying a bod in George Warner's room.

When the former came down stairs he was met by Rose, who told him that she had passed a sleepless hight, thinking of him and the dangerous position in which he was placing him self. If we and their land theory is a 14 position of the self.

"I will be careful," he replied, "for your sake, if not for my own. Whetstone has promised to help me, and I am sure that he will keep his promise. He will be a splential ally," with the minimum of the last the little and the last the little ally."

" He is a stranger, George, or almost a stranger."

"He is not a stranger to me. It is true that I am but slightly acquired I with him; yet I feel drawn to him as if I had known him a long time. He has a strong arm, is featles, and I believe him to be a good min."

"I have you are right, but am not sure. I thought he was very ugly, and was afrail of him, until I heard him promise to stand by you."

"Did that charge his looks? I don't think he was always so rely as he now seems to be. He has been unfortunate. I will tell you one thing that I learned last night, if you will promise not to repeat it. It is not a very great secret, perhaps; but he might not like to have it known."

"Of course I will promise. What is it?"

George bent down and whispered in her ear.

- "Why, George, that is terrible. Poor fellow! Did he show it to you?"
  - " No. I saw it by accident, without his knowledge."
  - " I want to tell father."
- "You have promised not to repeat it, and you must tell no one. And the first tell no in the state of the stat
- "I will keep the secret, if you say so. I am very sorry for him." I have the secret, if you say so. I am very sorry for

CHAPTER IV.

THE TRACTOR'S FATE ... THE TRACTOR'S FATE

Conenna Landar had an important communication to make to George Warner. He had not replied to the young gentleman's remark concerning a virilineal communities, for the reason that he had been sarprised to hearn that the same i backed to a proposal and partly curricle into operation by two distingular backed of men, acting without the knowledge of each cut. T. He did not know how far George might be speaking by authority, and was unwilling that any further disclosures should be made in the presence of the ladies and of a stranger.

A mutual explanation showed that Warner was connected with a land of young men who had formed a secret league for the purpose of breaking up Robris gang of desperadoes, and that Colonel Landry was connected with a similar association of other and wiser beside. Neither party was strong enough, of itself, to accomplish the purpose; but it was thought that they might, if united, succeed in ridding that portion of Texas of organized rufflauism.

In the course of this conversation Colonel Landry made a confession that was rather humiliating. He admitted that he had been in the habit, since the attack of which he was warned by Ben Blood, of paying a certain sum half-yearly to Paul Roder as the chief of his gang, as tribute or ransom money, by which payment he was secured from molestation. In accordance with the wishes of the gentlemen with whom he had associate! himself, he had decided to discontinue the payment, and had sent Roder notice to that effect. This was the first overt act of hostility.

"It was for Rosa," he said. "It was for her sake that I made the arrangement with Roder. When I thought of her I was really afraid. I could not have protected her against those brutal outlaws, and I am convinced that I acted wisely in purchasing peace. It is impossible to say to what lengths they might have gone, in attempting to extort money from me."

"I am not blaming you, sir. I am only sorry that the necesity for such a course should have arisen. Are you not afraid, now, that Roder may resent the notice you have given, and may take occasion to molest you again?"

There is danger that he may give trouble, and it is for that reason that I am glad to hear of the determination of the young men. The two organizations must come together, and an efficient plan of action must be adopted, or our condition will be worle than it was before."

Warner proposed that Nat Whetstone should be a limited to their deliberations; but the old gentleman objected to this, urging that as they yet knew little about him, and that it would not be proper to trust him so far on such short acquaintance. George thought that he could answer for his new friend, and it was finally agreed that the matter should be referred to the joint committees, who were to be brought together as soon as possible.

At this point in the conversation, the person of whom they had been speaking came in, and announced that he was about to leave the year matrix which traveline collector matrix.

George advised him to be careful about coming into collision with Roder's gang, and requested him to return to dinner. Colored Landry scoon but the request.

Wherstone premise, to act with proper caution. He was only going to stroll about, he said, to see what was to be seen, and he would be hoppy, with the permission of Colonel Landry, to call at the house again.

As he mounted his horse and rode away, his appearance was noticeably different from that which he had worn the preceding that. His is litery eye was brighter, and there was an air of dignity as well as determination about him, that well became him, and that rendered the unconadiness of his features less apperent, remoinds of the unconadiness of his features.

Here is into the woods, picketed his horse in the same rations from which he had taken him the previous evening, and from there walks I direct to Charles St. Chair's shanty.

If a find the proprietor alone in that establishment, sitting at a table, a unling some cards, and apparently studying their conditions. His barkceper was outside the door, with his chair tilted back against the building sunning himself and waiting it reation. Caron was by no means plentiful in the "sthand" at that hour. The regular habit dochood taken their to unling "nips and reach their several ways, and only now and then all inger dropped in to drive "another mail" in his called it was not until afternoon that playing commenced, and from then until midnight the excitement was on the ascendings.

"Have a grant" a hell St. Chair, as the stranger seated him-

"Not thank you. I don't know how to play. With I did.
It I has like an easy way of making money."

"Not so case as you think, if you really know nothing a tit. A present that leave, and that takes time and study."

When produce one board the tricks it is easy capacit,
In har board with another indicate

"livy to play, perhaps, but not always emy to win. A "S .. may; but you don't lose-do you?"

out it is cleared out."

"But you make up for it, and you win in the long run. I wish that I had sense enough to make money in some such Colors I have your second i that I have easy way."

"There are more easy ways than one to make money. Look here! -- ain't you one of the men who had a fittle fuss here last evening?".

"There was something of the kind. I saw a min with a knife drawn, and I hoisted him out of the door, for fear he might hurt somebody." ... " incident

- "Didn't he follow you to get even?"
- "Yes, and two others with him."
- "What did you do? Weren't you afraid?"
- "Afraid! I started in to study dictionary once, stranger, but I didn't get as far as that word. I give them to un crstand that it wouldn't be healthy for them to go any farther, as they might get a dose of something that might not agree with them."
  - "They may bounce you again. You had better look out."

" I always am booking out."

"You speak of casy ways of making money, as if you had been used to hard ways. Where do you come from?"

"The mountains. The remarked it for a long time, and have seen only the hard side of every thing. Evenlways found it a heap e sier to spend money than to make it."

"When I first noticed you, I thought you might be a prast."

" A priest!"

"Yes-from the cut of your coat."

"I worder what the man who used to own the cost would think, if he should see me in it."

"The feel wanted to keep the cout and the rest of his plunder," replied Whatstone, with a hard laugh. "He fought me for it; but he didn't win that fight. Fighting didn't agree with him, I reckon; for he died rather suclenty."

"A man who can get property in that style ought not to be troubled to find an easy way of making a living. You seem to have a stort arm and a stout heart. If you are the sort of man I think you are, I can put you in the way of doing some-والمال والمال المال المال المال thing."

I may say, between you and me, that if I can get money, I den't care much how I get it."

"The reare some men about here who are getting rich by finding thing, as you found your cont. They rule the country, and have very thing their wn ways. There is no law here to tradication. If there was any law, it would not dare to touch them. How we ald it sait you to join them?"

" "Nation before, it I can get my have of what's going" back on then, you had better wish the red skins had you."

"I would be sure to stay where the money was."

ab it you. Here could not not not now. You needn't han he your ritle. I will see that you are safe."

It was Paul Roder who entered the "saloon," followed by the barkooper, whom he had aroused from a doze. As his eyes fell on his antago is tof the previous evening, he muttered an each, and drown a pinal from his belt. Whetstone was equilibrately with his ride; but St. Chair at once spring between them, and solved Roll reby the arm.

"I) nit d. ot, captain!" he exclaimed. "This man is my friend and yours."

"He had a struct way of showing his friendship when he pitched mate me has evening," replied Roder.

"You went in as if it was a free tirit," said Whetstone,

"and I al. wed I might as well take a hund."

"He is a fide at I to I you," replied St. Clair. "He is all right, at I he is willier to join us. You know, captain that we want man, and he is easy with a stort arm and a stort heart."

"I have I have to know that his arm is ston! I "Will was that? will Wild'stone.

"New region now. If you train in our company, you will full out something about him after home Pancy Charley, here he as now, if anybody does. "When he says a man is all right, he has as what he's table a about. I den't here has been not here in a little place."

After pring their respects to the bar, the trio seated them-conversation was an agreement that Nat Whetstone should become a member of Roler's gang, entitled to the privileges and subject to the duties and penalties of such membership.

That night Charles St. Chair left his "saloon" in charge of his barkeeper, mounted his horse, and rode away, accompanied by Whetstone.

They rode until they reached a small and rule cabia, far in the timber. As they approached they were halted by a sentinel. The response of St. Clair to the hail being satisfactory, they dismounted and entered the hut, where they found a dozen armed men assembled. Among them was Paul Roder, who greeted the new-comers, and introduced Whetstone to the conclave.

The acophyte was soon initiated, and a terrible oath was administered, after which the captain proceeded to make him acquainted with his duties, and especially with the punishment that would be inflicted upon him in case he should attempt to play the part of a traitor.

"We never had but one man who went back on us," sail Rober, "and his went what you might call a bad case; but we make an example of him, as a sort of lesson and warning to the rest."

"Who was he?" asked Whetstone.

"His name was Ben Blood, and he was a right likely chapthe same than I spoke to you about, who had such a hard grip. He had got in with Colonel Landry, who lives here, and had taken a notion to quitting us. It so happened that we had arranged to clean out the colonel's ranch one night, when we were sure of a big hand. Ben Blood refused to have any thing to do with the job, and we had to let him eff.
Tancy Charley, here, was sure that he meant to give the colonel a hint; so he watehed him, and saw him go to the hore.
When we visited the runch that night, and found the folks all away, we know what the matter was, and we hunted up the trainer. We found him in this very calin, getting ready to leave the centry. We surrounded the cabin, and waited until morning, when we took him as soon as he poked his nose out, and carried him off and settled him."

"What dil you do?"

&quot;Well-such an unmerciful whipping as we gave that chap

was rather more than one man can stand up under. When he came to, a Mexican who was with us—he's gone under since that—had scooped out one of his eyes. And that wasn't the worst of it's a real or brind at all indicates.

They have then 2" of the finite ") work or the little to the

" We war god h.m."

"Dad! Not a bit of it. We waited till he was wide awake enough to know what was going on, and then we raised his bar. That's his sculp, hanging up yonder."

Whetstone shuddered visibly, and looked at the wall, where he saw a dried scalp, covered with long black hair, nailed against a log. I'm andama

"Dilly whill him then?" he asked.

"N - it that's the beauty of it. We left him to die in his own way."

" Could he have lived?"

"There was a splinter of a chance, maybe, worth as much as a learning of the learning in a half-storm. He crawled off a little —some of the legs sail—they dish't follow the trail; but the learner is seen got him, of course."

" It was a hard far ."

"It was that. We did it for a lesson and warning. You know, now, how we would take your sculp if you should go back on us." To be to his will standed to do.

who were here then I' as he is the last the men here now

"Two have gone under—Bill Routh and the Mexican. The rest are here. Now, beys, let us talk business a little. Do yea his withint some men are trying to get up a vigilance committee against us?"

[10] [10] [10] [10] [10]

No the had heard of it.

"They are mighty sly about it; but they can't fool old Rober He has as much about their plans as they know them lives. That's one thing we've got to look out for. Clin Han'ry belows to the committee, of course; for he has given men a feet that he means to quit paying unit

St. Chair junged to his feet with a joyful exclamation.

"Sais vou, Charley-does it?"

" You may but it does. You know that I would have paid more than he paid, if you had only let me have my way?" grow s'edillor distant and all marked!

"That's all square; but I had passed my word to the old man that he shouldn't be molested so long as he paid. You will have your chance now, Charley, and you won't find your friends lackward in helping you. Colonel Landry thinks his vigilance committee is stronger than we are; but he will learn better before we are done with him."

After some further, "husiness" the meeting broke up, and the band separated or our pair

"To-morrow night we will be here again," said Roder to Whetstone, "and we will expect you."

"All right," replied the new member. "You may depend upon me." Spains of Easter 18 18 er off of eril Polovil of to the of odl - ind be.

d an an incomposition promise of to retailer a composition. The CHAPTER V.

A CHAPTER OF INCIDENTS.

The next night there was a meeting at Ferguson's ranch, which was numerously attended by gentlemen from various parts of Texas, some of whom resided more than fifty miles from March's Settlement. The object of the assemblage was the forming of a vigilance committee, for the purpose of stopping the depredations of Roder's gang, and of rendering life and property more seeme in northern Texas. The meeting was as private and secret as possible, none being admitted but men who were bringed to be friendly to the cause, and whose discretion could be relied upon.

Colonel Landry was present at the meeting at Percessal's ranch. George Warner was there, and Nat Whetsone was there. The last named individual was introduced and voyels I for by his friend Warner. He was surely playing false with a separate or the other, as Roder's garg mut the same night at the limbs cable in the young and Whetstone had promised to be present in a last subspace and whetstone had promised to be present in a last subspace after put all or improving the last

There was some comment among Roder's men upon the non-appearance of the new member of the gang; but Charles

St. Clair emphatically gave it as his opinion that the man was "all right," and Roder was not at all uneasy on the subject.

The vigitance committee was duly discussed, and Roder give the information that he had gained, assuring the month at he would soon know more. What he already knew was not a little, and it would have surprised the members of the committee if they could have heard him tell their names and explain their plans so accurately. The men whose names he marking have a potted "as objects of vengeance, and the gang proceeded to talk of their own projects.

One of these was of great interest to St. Chair, to judge by his excitement when it was mentioned, and the eagerness with which he discussed it. When the details were arranged, and it was announced that the project was to be executed immediately, he was in high glae, and announced his intention of giving a "grand blow-out" to all who should be concerned in it.

"It sails me enactly, captain," he said. "It will be the best

"I don't know about that. There ain't much pay in it, as I sou; hat it will give these visit mee folks to understand that we ain't afrall of 'on, and it may scare them off the track."

"If it den't pay, you may have my head for a football. You do the work, and I will guarantee the pay."

"We will all be glad to please you, Charley, anyway. What s that neise at the door?"

There was a specifical against the rough door, followed by a making so at l. The men looked at each other, and uneasy glances were cast at the lear. Ignorance is superstitious, and guit is not while it its trement.

"It's a der, Isaje "raji I St. Cillr.

"I don't think a day would be likely to come around here he had be in which to night?"."

night?"."

Jian Baker."

"" " Jian Baker."

nun to come which signifies. It didn't sound like a dog, though, and we had a like will have what it is. Step to the dog, Mart Sangen, and had out."

The man who was a linewed did not move.

" Why don't you open the door, Mart?"

" I ain't ashamed to tell you, cap'n, that I'm kinder scared."

"Seared! What on earth are you afrabl of?"

- "It didn't sound like a dog, as you said. The scratchia' was too high up, and the mounin' was onairthly. It aim't a dow, and it cain't be a man. I've a notion that it's a ghost." that about the mount has a
- "You miserable fool! There ain't any ghosts. If it was a glost, it couldn't hurt you. Open the door!"

"That it is ag'in!" replied the man, as he drew back with a shralder.

Paul Roder jumped up with a savage cath, stepped to the door, and threw it wide open. As he did so, he turned deathly pale, and staggered back into the middle of the room.

The door was opposite to the wide fireplace, in which a fire of lors was blazing, illuminating the interior of the cabin. As the door was opened, the light fell upon a strange and terrible figure standing in the doorway—a tall and athletic man, coarsely clad, pale and bloody. His head was covered with long black bair, except at the crown, where it was raw and bleeding. There were streaks of blood on his face, and patches of blood on his bands, with one of which he pointed at his head, and the other he extended through the doorway, uttering a low moaning cry.

"Ben Blood!" exclaimed Roder, in a hoarse whisper, as ho staggered back is the reason whisper as he

"His ghost!" replied Mart Simpson, in the same tone.

The others stood arrhast and silent, some covering their faces with their hands, and others staring, as if fascinated, at the fearful sight.

"I've come for my scalp !" said the figure, still reaching its hand through the decreasy.

"Give it to him," whispered St. Chir; but nobody stirred.

"I want my sculp," repeated the figure. "My heal is a 14"

The men shuddered, and were silent. At last Roder, who was nearest the door, summoned up courage to give the door a pash, which closed it against the figure, and Mart Simpson instantly barred it.

It was some moments before any one spoke. All were thornighly frightened, and looked anxiously at the door drending the reappearance of the specier, or some new and mero fearful development. But it was not seen or heard again, and they to gain to speak to each other, at first in whispers, and maked a siy as their courses came back to them.

I never saw a glast at re," said Paul Roder, "and I never belleved in glasts; but I can swear on a stack of Bibles that I've seen one this night."

"I have been feeling that way sence last night. I was sure that no degree ill make that noise, nor any living mortal."

"It was Ben Blead's givet," said St. Clair. "I have had my doubts whether that man might not be living; but now I know that he is dead?" ,"

A cry was hear i cut ide, and all jumped to their feet again, but they recovered their equipmentity when it was repeated and reconsized as the half of the soutry.

In a f w minet's the door opened, and Nat Whetstone walked in. The appropriate of this man was a great relief to his minet by a proceed.

- " We have had a tan of it to might," said Roder.
- "What was the marter?" a hed Whetstone.
- "It I you are any body, or any thing, as you came along?"
- " Not ody but Jim Dai, r."
- " Had he seen any thing?"
- " If he had, he didn't mention it to inc."
- "The chon he didn't see it. If he had, it would have scared him as had as any of the rest of us, and he wouldn't have falled to speak of it."
- "What have you bed I'
  - "A char! You are unding fun of me."
- "There's no joke about the matter. We are all ready to take or is a called that we saw it. Do you remember what we take the life who went back on us?"

  - " It was his on the house phost"
  - " Ind you specify to him?"
  - " No: Lat he spike to us."
  - "What did he want?"

224

"His sculp. He stood in the doorway there, with the top of his head all raw and bleeding, and held out his hand to us, and told us to give him his sculp."

Did you give it to him?" .....

"Not we. We were too ball scare! for that."

"I tald you to give it to him, captain," remarked St. Clair; "but none of you moved."

"Neither did you move. Why didn't you give it to him yourself? You were as had scare I as any of us, I reckon. I was the on'y man who had send enough to shut the door."

"It's a pity you hadn't given him his scalp," remarked Whetstone, "when he cause and a ked for it so politely. Very likely he would have gone away, when you had given it to him, and would never have troubled you any more. Don't you know why it is these ghosts show themselves? It's always something missing that they are after, something that ou ht to be settled, and they can't rest easy in their graves until they get what they want. If they get it, they ge away; if they don't get it, they keep coming."

"I wish to thunder that Fancy Charley there had given him his sculp. It's bad lack for him to be botherin' about here, and I don't like the looks of him, anyhow. If I only knew where he is burish, I would go and put the rotted old sculp in his grave."

"Is it at all likely that he is buried anywhere?" You left him to die, and he could not have buried himself. If you want to find his grave, you had better ask the buzzards."

"How in them ler, if the buzzards took him, did he get hims of phosel to other, and come here to bother us to-night?"

"That is more than I can tell you. How did he get his clothes? They ought to have rotted before this time, and the blood on his head out ht to have dried. There's no accounting for phose, I tell you. But one thing seems to be certain—if you saw the man's chost, the man must surely be dead."

"Yes, he is deal-no doubt about that."

"And that's lucky for you. If his ghost can give you so much trouble, what would the man do, if he was living?"

"I own that I'm scary about ghosts; but Paul Roder was never afraid of any living man."

"We will gain nothing by talking about it. If the ghost shows hims if when I am here, I will take his scalp down from the wall and give it to him."

"I believe per we did do it, Wherstone. But he won't be here again to night, and we must brook up. We have a job to do before a religg; but we won't ask yea, as you are a n. who miles, and the party is all not be up."

The next in rid of the was great excitement among both the parties that were structling for the accordency in and about March's Settlem at. The law and order men were astallshed, once I am I distanced by the fact that Colonel Landry's home had been attached, while he and George Warn's were a's at at Ferry, his ranch, and his duranter Ree had in a far thy carried away. There was no doubt that Red ris and ware easy rad be for the outrare, although the assailants, who name is I tan men, were all maked. They had only everpowered the few servants of the house, as the liquidity retired with Rese, without doing any special diving to the points.

Relate that were surprised, infuriated and almost terrible by the fact that one of their number had been found deal at the realistic a start distance from the settlement. An arrow had gene through his body, his scalp was missing, and one of his eyes had be a scroped out. On his breast was plus in page, with these words written in large letters.

"As on for an one, and a majo for a sail

No no could har rid even a greek at the perpetuator of this dock, except R. brand his friends, who at once decided among themselves that it was the work of the ghost.

CHAPTER VI.

A CHALLENGE ACCEPTED.

NAT WHITSTONE was made acquainted with the exciting topics of the morning, as soon as he entered March's Settlement. He went direct to St. Clair's "saloon," where he found many people who were full of information upon both subjects, and who were willing to dispense it without money and without price.

Without noticing these retailers of gossip, he directed his steps to the head-quarters of news, and was soon scated in a corner, holding a quiet confab with Paul Roder and Charles

St. Clair.

These two were full of the topic that most nearly concerned themselves, and speedily told all they knew of the man who had been so mysteriously murdered. At the same time there was some suspicion in their tone and manner, and Whetstone thought that he could guess what troubled them.

"You noticed that I was late at your meeting last night," he said; "but none of you asked me why I was so late."

"We knew the rea on," replied Roder. "That is, we were not sire then; but we know all about it now."

"You know that I was at Ferguson's ranch, with the vigilance men."

"Yes. I was waiting to hear what you had to say about

"Nothing in particular. As you know that I was there, it is I kely that you know all I could tell you."

"Reion we do; but I didn't know that we had two men watching them."

" Who was the other?

" Perhaps you can guess."

"Perhaps I can. His name is Lawrence Satterlee."

"You are smart, Whetstone, by thunder! I wouldn't have thought that any man could have guesed it. Do you suppose that any of the vigilance men suspected him?"

"If they had I think I would have heard of it. But it can't be long before they do sepect him. I don't think he plays his part with. You had better take him off the trail, and let me attend to that business."

"We will do it. Windtown. You are a smart chap, and I am gial we have gut hall of you. How did you happen to go there?"

- to m be it colds and I want a hope of it. When I went into this being son hand to pay attention to it. You will it is a large on hand, captain, ready for work that will pay well."
- "Yalle right sort, sure. What do you think about that killing affair?"

"What do you think about it?"

"We think it is the work of the ghost-Ben Blood's

.".ost."

- "In writing any holy? How can thay, who takes deal, when there's a thing of them but air?"
- "B t this ghost hart so addity. Who clear could have donic? Who clear the latter done it is that way? There's had by at a the traine Bon Blood's part, except his ghost, and we have that we remain ghost last higher than the ghost.
- There very a rate of in all with a to the three the large of the large

"I don't black, Who telege. I was never afraid of any liv-

" W. .. in a home the his blacker by?"

" No are river to being it

"I will be with your

The three many and the the square the long had been discorded. The condition of the residence of the last been discorded by the last of the condition of the last of the last Roder and his frients inspected the body closely, and rend the paper that was still pinned upon its breast, and then Whetstone pulled out the arrow that had given the man his death-warrant. He wiped out the blood, examined it carefully, and handed it to Roder.

"That is a Comanche arrow, captain."

"A Comanche arrow! How do you know that? How can you tell a Comanche arrow from any other arrow?"

"By the make of it. I have been among the Comanches and I know their arrows."

"But there are no Comanches within two hundred miles of here."

"Very likely; but that is a Communche arrow."

"That beats me worse than any thing that has happened yet. How could a ghost get hold of a Comanche arrow."

"I don't know any thing about ghosts; but I su; pose they can do any thing they want to do. This one means to give you trouble, I am afraid. What a pi y you hadn't given him his scalp when he asked for it!"

"I wish we had. I will take the arrow to Jim Baker, and ask him what he thinks about it. He has been among the Comanches. Let us bary the poor fellow."

That work was soon finished, and the mon returned to the settlement. After a little further conversation with his friends, Whetstone left them, and went to Colonel Landry's.

He found the household in great trouble and confusion. Colonel Landry him elf was in such a condition that he was incapable of giving any directions. At one time he was farious, at another de pondent. He declared that Roder's going had committed the outrage, that the men were known, and that they must instantly be pursued and penished. The next moment he bewailed his folly in connecting himself with the viril new committee and in stopping his payment to Roder, vowing that his friends had rained him, that he would never see his child again. His friends exerted his utterances, as he was growing old, and was entirely wrapped up in Robe. His wife was planged in grief, and her condition was fully as plainable as that of her hurband.

George Warner was there, with several of the members of the vigilance committee. After vainly end avoring to console Mrs. Landry and to induce the colonel to listen to reason, they had befut the old people to their own devices, and had set at work to consult seriously concerning what should be done in the matter. The servants had been examined, but nothing definite had been elicited from them. There could be not doubt that the outrage had been perpetrated by members of Rober's garg; but there was nothing to identify the men.

All were of the eqinion that the abduction of Rose Landry had been intended as an act of defiance, as a declaration of war against the vigilance committee. The time had come for a struggle, said George Warner, for a struggle that could no longer be deferred. If they should refuse to accept this challenge, they we all so a located hand and foot, at the mercy of the lawless ruthurs who had so long controlled that portion of Texas.

It was agreed, after a little hesitation, that the audacious challenge should be received, that Role Landry should be received at all hazards, and that the vigilants should exterminate Roll risigang, or less their lives in the attempt. Warner brought pens, ink and paper, and proceeded to draw up a notice, to be posted in March's Settlement that night.

It was while this document was being composed, that Nat Whets to arrive I at the house. He sympathized very warmly with Colord Landry and his wife, and approved of the resolution which the gentlemen present had taken; but advised that they should move cautiously, not risking too much until their organization should be completed.

"Then it is "he will, "may do the work. If it does not, you have probled it with great work with a large force; fry note that he these people."

"Diving have It, sirl' asked our of the committee.

"I believe it is an at r then you suppose it to be. But you be a large to be in a borny to take any farther measures. Per-

With this had hellow, followed by supicious looks; but suspicious dot not be yet the best in works.

Harly in the middle of the same day two strange characters might have been seen, if may no held been there to see them, to are (bland) Lawing's have. Perhaps they might not have been seen, except by a very sharp sighted person; for they evidently tried to avoid observation, and as evidently were well able to do so.

Paul Roder had said that there were no Comanches within two hundred miles of March's Settlement; but these were Indians, and to what other tribe did they belong?

One was short, and inclined to be bow-legged; but Le had a high forehead, good features, an la commanding expression of countenance, as well as the head-dress of a chief. The other was taller and more athletic, with the apparature of a white man, rather than that of an Indian. He was only partially attired in Indian costume, and his head was covered with a stouched hat, from beneath which long, block thir flowed down upon his shoulders. As he tais this bure right arm, the moonlight fell upon it, showing a skin swarthy, but not red, marked with a long black arrow, the point toward his hand.

Although these two avoided of servation, and kept a sharp look out to make sure that they were not noticed, they walked with their eyes bent upon the ground most of the time, and were undoubtedly looking for something.

"I have found it," sai! the tall man at last.

"Are my brother's eyes so good?"

"No better than yours, Ne-cum-wa. It does not need very good eyes to see such a plain trail in the moonlight. We have just come upon it. See—it is easy enough to follow it."

"Let Black Arrow take up the trail, and Ne-cum-wa will look to see whether we are watch 1"

The tall man followed the trail swiftly, with his companion close at his heels. He was evidently used to trailing, and this was a broad and new track easily visible in the moon light. It led him to the north-east of the few buildings that composed March's Settlement, through a piece of heavy timber, then across a strip of prairie, to a wooded arroyo, dry at that time, but a considerable water course during the wet season.

At a warning whistle from Ne-cum-wa, both sunk down into the grass silent and noticules.

"Look!" whispered Nescanawa, pointing at a man who was walking rapidly across the prairie, not a hundred yards from where they lay. Both watched the man until he disappeared in the arroyo, and then rose and followed him.

"It is just as I thought," said Black Arrow. "I know that man. I know the spet to which he is going, and the purpose for which he goes."

He quirt end his steps, and Ne-cum-wa followed him as rapidly. They decend I to the bottom of the arroyo, which was about twenty for deep, and stopped where a large log was lying a linst the bank, as it had fallen from above.

"D -- my bracker seel" asked Black Arrow, as he pointed at the leg. "Let Ne-cum-wa wait and watch. Black Arrow will return be fore the mean is down."

Nece mewa noted d, and concealed himself in the arroyo, while his companion walked swiftly away.

CHAPTER VII.

BLACK ARROWS.

AT the same her at which Black Arrow and Nescum-wa took up the trail from Colonel Landry's house, Paul Roder's non were again a mailing at the little cal in in the wood. The older of this modify was to make arrangements to attack a train of trules and emigrants that was expected from the Hart. There but little father frontier, mostly fugitives from the law, had adjudent the problemy had its of the red-men, and Lalus ton a sout fir plant rus buzzards have for carrion. There were two distributions in dealing with them, one arising from the mental condition of the country and the powerlessions of the offers of justice; the other arising from the for their their real servetth could not be definitely ascertained, to the large bed its manife attems through the country, and the In will be for an entire the second of the first that the law has in anceller, which the who fewered law and order had scarcely any chiling or and of action.

trin, and he assured his associates that it would be the most valuable prize that had yet come within their reach.

St. Chair was not proceed when this scheme was developed, and Whatstone was a late arrival.

"What has become of the sentinel?" inquired the latter, when he entered the cabin. "No one hailed me as I came in sight of the shanty."

"Mart Simpson is on guard," replied Roder. "He is a careless hand; but he is somewhere about. He knew you, I reckon, and thought it wasn't worth while to hail you. That ain't the right way to do business, anyhow, and Mart must have a blowing up about it. What made you so late this time, Whets'one? Have you been with the vigilance folks ag'in?"

"Not to night, captain; but I saw semething of them this morning. You have made them mad this time, and you will know what they mean to do before you are many hours of ler."

"What is it, now? They had better leave us alone."

"They mean to give you notice that Landry's girl mu t be brought back, or you may expect war to the death."

"Just what we want. They will find out who is hos. We are too many for them, whether they know it or not."

"Very well. You know more about that than I do, Have you seen the ghost to-night?"

"Not yet," replied Roder, with a perceptible shudder. "I am glad you have come, as you promised to give him his sculp if he should call for it again."

"I will give it to him when he comes, and you may be sure that that will be the last of him. What business is on hand to-night?"

Roler proceeded to explain the plan that had been formed, and Whetstone express I the liveliest satisfaction at the propert of "making money casy." The explanations were hardly finished, when St. Clair entered the cabin, a little the worse for Legion, but with a pleased and triumphent air.

- "Nob dy on guard to night?" asked the new-comer.
- "Yes," replied Roller. "Mart Simpson is the man."
- "Pretty watch he keeps. He don't make himself seen or heard."
- "Just what Whets'one said. I wender if any thing is the matter with him. I'm keen to swear, by thunder! that he's lyin' out that drunk. Let's go and look for him."

Torches were lighted, and the whole company went out into the timber to look for their missing comrade.

"Just as I thought!" exclaimed Roder, as he tumbled over the negligent sentry. "Here he is, drunk and asleep,"

But ki ks and curses did not awaken the sleeper, and more lights were brought to the spot.

"Dead, by thunder !"

" Sculped !"

" An arr a through him !"

"See this yere paper!"

The man were dead, no doubt, lying in a pool of his own 11. I, an arrow in his body, his scalp missing, one of his eyes e. : 1 c.: t, a: la paper pinned to his breast, with these words upon it:

" in the first of a contract a sector for a sector."

"The glast mg in !" exclaime ! Reder.

"No interale at it this time," remarked St. Clair, who was now thoroughly sober. -

"Never among. That glast will be the death of us all yet."

" What a pity you he la't given him his scalp!"

"What a pity to hadn't given it to him, instead of talking about it so much."

"Signed the about hed got his scalp," suggested Whetstone, with a stratege smiller " Then he might have come back for his ex."

" That's sally thunder! and we heren't got the eye to give him. Let us scratch a l. de, boys, and bury this man. I can't bear to look at him."

A le by was made, and the body of Mart Simpson was intermil; mut before Where : had extracted the arrow.

"A C ........ arrow," he sail, as he wiped it and handed it to Paul Roder.

No received at that meeting. A From his rearrall who were present. It was an ususual - Taile and the saw offer tone, who was allow other-Ti that ay. The were appulled in view of the awful and myster is fate of the father number, a fate that might at any much at healt may of them - any of them, at least, who 1 It at a med in the paritment of Bon Blood; the call a faint here that they might be out of the serape,

Little was said among them before they separated, geing their respective ways in groups or pairs.

Whetstone accompanied Charles St. Clair, and soon commenced a conversation with him.

" For my part," said he, " I don't think I am afraid of the ghost, as I had nothing to do with killing that fellow, or with taking his scalp or his eye. Did you have a hand in the matter ?"

" No. I had a say-so about it; but the others did the work. I followed him to Landry's."

- "You informed against him, then. I am sorry to hear it, as I had taken a liking to you, and I am afraid the ghost nav give you trouble. It would be a pity if any thing should happen to you now, just when you have got what you have been so long wishing for."
  - "What is that? What are you speaking of?"

"Rose Landry, of course."

" How do you know that I have got her?"

- "Guessed it. Don't you know that I am good at guessing? Didn't Captain Roder tell you what I guessed about Lawrence Satterice? It was easy enough to guess that you have Rose Landry. Where have you put her?"
- "That would be telling. You may be sure that she is safe. and I would defy the devil himself to find her. She is in a place that no living man knows any thing about, except Roder and me."
  - " No living man?" --
  - " No other man ever knew it, but one, and he is dead."

"Who was he?" . . . . . . .

"Ben Blood."

"Perhaps, Charley, his ghost may remember the place."

- "Curse you! Why did you speak of that? There-don't get riled, Whetstone. It turns my quills all up to think about that infernal ghost. Very likely you are right. I will take her away from there in the morning."
- "I hope you may find her safe, and that the ghost may leave you to the last, if he can't do any better by you. Goodnight!"
- St. Chir hastened away, bosening his pittol in his belt, and looking anxiously around him as he went. The last words uttered by Whetstone had left an unpleasant im; ression upon Lim, and he was nervous and unersy. Two of the men who were concerned in the Ben Blood affair had been, as Roder sail, "rubb dout" some time previously. Two men had been act their down, in a terrible a domysterious way. There were but five both, in luding himself. Could it be possible, as Wheter he had suggested, that the revengeful ghost intended to take them of one by one, leaving him to the last? The thought child this blood, and he mentally resolved that if another should be taken, he would fly the country.

Paul Raier and Jim Baker walked together; but they had not far to go, as they soon stopped at the cabin occupied by the latter.

Here they raised out the embers in the rude fire-place, piled on some word, and some had a brisk fire blazing. By the aid of the fire, and of the contents of a black bottle which Baker produced, they some heated their blood, and were enabled to talk quite boilly of the recent terrilying events.

" Let me lock at that arrer, cap'n," said Baker, after the death of Sings a lead been duly discussed.

Roler harled to his companion the arrow that had been drawn from Simpson's body, and Baker, after wiping it, examined it closely.

"It's a Cemun he arrer," he said, "just as that fellow told ye—jest as t'other one was."

- "He knew all about it, then." !!

- "Yars, and I'd like to be sertin how he knows so much."
- " He had been among the Commelies, he said."
- "Like et. ouh: but I've seen folks afore now who knowed to not h, and it may tun out this chap is one of 'em. Thar's an ther sathin a' or this arrer, cap'n."

" What's that?"

"The config. It's a black arrer. Tother one was a black arrer too."

" Is there any thing strange in that?"

- "Yaka Thin't often you see an arrer painted that way, or any other way. There a chief among the southern Comanches who goes by the name of Black Arrer."
- "Yel win to know more about the matter than Whetstone knew, and yet you hint that he knows more than he object to. You don't suppose that that Comanche chief has come down here to kill eas men?"

"I don't suppose nothin'. Here's two black arrers. Suthin sing'lar 'bout that. Thar's a Comanche chief numed Black Arrer. Put this and that together. I never see'd Black Arrer; but I've heerd that his blood ain't all red. Add this to tother, and wat's the amount?"

" Well, what is it?"

"That's for you to say. I ain't good at countin'. I only give the figgers."

Paul Roder leaned his head upon his hand a few minutes and gazed at the fire with a troubled and perplexed expression. Then he looked up suddenly at his companion.

"Don't talk nonsense to me, Jim Baker," he said. "You mountain-men are always full of your out-of-the-way notions, and some people believe in them just because they are so queer and unlikely. It's quite out of reason that any Comanche should be down this way, whether a half-bree lor a full-blooded red. It's a great deal stranger that our men should have been shot with arrows, than that the arrows should be black. I don't make any thing of that."

"Let it be, then."

"It's one thing or t'other. Either Ben Blood's ghost is after us, or we didn't kill him as dead as we thought we did."

" P'raps we didn't."

"You may have heard tell of men who have lived after their hair has been railed. You mountain men have plenty of such yarns. I never saw such a man, and I don't believe you ever did. That chap was hardly living when we left him, and the breath couldn't have stayed in him an hour longer."

"Did ye never hear of John Glass and the b'ar ?"

" Yes; I have heard that yarn."

"Glass was dead, torn all to giblets, with his sculp down over his face—so chawed up that he wasn't wuth buyin'; but he turned up livin' at last."

That may be true, though I don't bet high on such yarns. Do you mean to say that Ben Blood has come to life, and had a hand in this killin'? Of course you don't. His glast is about here, we know. If you had seen this ghost, as the rest of us saw it, you would know what the matter is."

"Whar did you pick up that Whet tone chap?"

- "What! You ain't going to say that he has been killing our men?"
- "I never af re saw you fly off the handle so easily, cap'o. Dill I say any thin' a 'in' him? Think ye mought answer a civil question."

"We came acress him-Charley and I-and we took a notion to him."

"Da't be serter 'mind you of Ben Blood?"

"A little-yes. Has a new notion struck you now, Jim Baker? This man carries his sculp on the top of his head."

"I've noticed that, partic'har. If I hadn't, I don't know what I monght hav thought. Are ye sure he is all right?"

"I den't pretend to be dead sure of any man. He had bet-

"Her 's one as don't like to trust any man too fur on short acquaintance."

"You are right about that, Jim, and I don't know but I am trusting this man a little too far. I will put Satter-lee to watch him for a while.

CHAPTER VIII.

BIND AND FIND,

Wm are not yet done with the events of the night that with not the domain of Mart Silapson. Before finishing the normal not no mart not not below the capture of Rose Landry.

The young hely, if she could have been examined by members of the vigil are committee, or even by George Warner, we like a leave been able to give a more definite account of the occurrence than was obtained from her taother or the services.

quickly and quickly an entered, quickly and quickly, by a number of masked men; that the masked men was a cold by and rather control of their leader, who seemed to have all the instant outs of the building; that all the inmates were at once seized, and compelled, by threats or ly gags, to keep quict; that she herself was gagged, and was partly led, partly carried, away from her home.

She was blindfolded and placed upon a horse, which was led away slowly. She did not know in what direction the was taken, or how far she went; but the journey scened a long one, as it was painful and tedious.

At last the horse was stopped, and she was taken down and compelled to walk. There was then but one man with her, she behind, and he held her arm. She knew that she descended into a ravine, where the man was obliged to hold her tightly to prevent her from falling. After a little while she was thrust through an opening in the earth, she supposed, and fell forward on the damp ground. She was not much hurt by the fall; but her situation was so dreadful, that her senses gave way, and she fainted where she fell.

When she came to herself, the bandage had been removed from her eyes, and she was seated on a pile of blankets. She looked around, and found herself in a small and low apartment, that looked as if it had been dug out of the ground. The walls were damp and gloomy; but in one corner a little fire was blazing, recently kindled, which might in time have the effect of dispelling the damp, though its smoke was at that moment far from pleasant.

The man who had kindled the fire stood near it, gazing at it, and occasionally looking at Rose. He was the only person, besides herself, in the apartment, and she shuddered as she looked at him. She had seen him frequently, and she knew his name—he was called Charles St. Clair; but he had only once had the authoity to speak to Colonel Landry's daughter. On that occasion—it was plain that he had been drinking too much—he had uttered some threats which she had then disregarded, but which now caused her to tremble with fright as they came back to her memory.

"You know me, I see," sail St. Clair, as he noticed her look. "You will know me better, I reckon, before you are through with me. But don't be scare!, lady-bird, I'm neither a bear nor a painter. I won't est you and I won't hurt you in any way, if you will behave yourself and be docide."

"What do you want? What have you brought me here

f r?" asked Rese, as soon as she could overcome the choking sensation in her throat.

"What a quistion! As if you don't know! Have you forgetten what I said to you once? You didn't take much notice of me then; but I reckon you remember. You are Colonel Landry's daughter, and that's why you are here. Sone of us have get a qualge against the old man; but that ain't all. I want to come in for his money—d'ye see?—and I love you, Ruse. That's the long and the short of it."

"If you really have not," cutreat d Ree, "take me home to my parents. I will thank you and bless you exhag as I live, and I am sure that you will be well rewarded."

"Come, now; that is asking too much. You can't think that I would take all this trouble for nothing. You may bet your pile that I do hove you, lady-bird, and I mean to prove it by making you my wife. Then you may bless me all your life, and I will make sure of being well rewarded some that."

R m grouned, and covered her face with her hands.

"This isn't what you might call a right comfortable place," o minus I St. Clair; "but I don't mean that you shall stay here many days. The fire will take the chill off, though it may some a little smoky at first, and there are plenty of limit to make you confortable. I must have you for a while, though I am afraid that you will be seared while I am gone."

me." No. m: I smill do very well. For God's sake leave

"I'll do it; but you needn't be very glal; for you're not g lagt, get out of here while I am gone. I shall have a man here—a friend of mine—who will feed you and this care of you. I he promise have pleasant dreams, especially if you dream a man?"

St. Clair of appears I through the opening, and R. of found hers lift. As a has she could replie her composure, she at hers if to endow her prion. It was, as has been such a she had a warrened, damp and gloomy. The fire and of which found some invisible outlet—made it could that, and have sufficient light for her investigation. There is a court to a court and harrely scattered about, some of them empty, and others quite heavy. There were also some tin dishes, cooking utensils, and a variety of miscellaneous articles, including a number of blankets and skins. Her couch was composed of plank laid on the ground covered with blankets.

Having observed thus much, she went to the entrance, determined, if there should be a chance for escape in that direction, to avail herself of it at once. She found it narrow, sloping upward, and so dark that she could see nothing. She could only trust to her sense of touch, which soon showed her that she was helple s. The opening was closed by some obstruction, so heavy or so well fastered that her utmost efforts could not stir it.

Having exhausted herself in vain, she laid down upon her bed of blankets, to rest and to think. As far as she could see, if she could escape in any way, it must be by digging. She judged that her prison was in the side of a hill, and that it would be possible, if she had the time and the tools, to open a tunnel to the air. At all events, there could be no harm in making the attempt, and she began to search for a mething to dig with.

She found a broken ca e-knife, which she thought would be useful, and took it to the greeto examine it. As she did so, she perceived something shining on the ground, and picked it up. It was a knife, bright and sharp, with a long blade and a buck-horn handle, of that pattern which has done more to make the name of Bowie famous, than his gallant death at the Alamo. It had doubtless been dropped by St. Chair.

As Rose looked at this weapon, she thought that it might be used for her defense, as well as to aid her escape. She did not pretend to be very herole; but she believed that disperation might inspire her with courage to use it, and she hoped that God would give her strength in time of need.

The knife was a comfort to her. It was a God end, it was a companion, it seemed to give her strength. Show concealed it among the blunkers of her couch, and haid down, believing that she could rest better with the weapon by her side.

She did sleep, after an hour or so of wakefulness, and her slunders were not broken until morning, when she was aroused by the descent of some person through the entrance to her prison.

Charles St. Clair, although he had beasted to Whetstone that only two men besides himself had ever known of his hill 2-pace, had been obligad to confide it to another per on; but talk pars in was one in wacm he could trust implicitly.

This was the man who entired Rose's prison-house, bringings me for lands one fuel to replenish the fire. Rose was glad that it was not St. Clair, and tried tears and entreaties to independent to take her home or suffer her to escape. But the man was said not be breate and silent, having probably recelve this is startlers from St. Chair. Her prayers and teats produe to more impression up on him than a shower would produe up nor elegant be went, as he had come, without a word.

When he had gene, Rest are a pertion of the food that had I n br ight, and at once set at work resolutely to dig her way cit. She inturally commenced on the same side where there was alrady an opening, and labored vicorously, with the knife and with her hands, carefally taking up the earth as she dag it cat, and parties it in one of the empty boxes, where she Concellit with a bladiet. It was slow work; but she had male, by the time saw was completely thed out, a hole in waith ster crail hite besself. When she haid down to not, Sir low at a takent the l. le, and covered it with a blanket. Sar was entiatelly treated, while she was at work, by the far that St. Clair or the other man might come upon her unity ares and dis over what she was doing; but she was not distor! I until night, when St. Chir came, bringing her friend deinit. Helekel suspiciously at her as she reclined on her continued drew a lox to her side, placed upon it value la la la la la caracilla, and invital her to cat.

If I am in we brishly, and examined the ground by its light.

"Il taknife bet night," he said, "and thought I might Rose did not answer. . . .

" like an amount of her mail, coming toward her. "A knife more or less don't of mt, while I have something worth more than a whole world full of knives. You are mine now, ladybird. Come to me!"

As he advanced with outstretched arms, Rose Landry believed that the time had come to try her courage and her weapon. She started up, drew the bowic-knife, and flashed the bright blade before his eyes.

"Stand back!" she exclaimed. "Don't come a step nearer, or I will drive this knife into your heart!"

St. Chair let his hands fall at his sides, and burst into a rear of laughter.

"Mighty good tragedy airs?" he said, mockingly. "Never saw them beat at Orleans. It's a pity to show them for nothing. I gue sed that you had my knife, lady-bird, and thought I could make you show it. Will you give it to me, or will you make me take it away from you?"

Rose still brandished the bowie threateningly, and bale him advance at his peril.

With a mocking smile St. Clair slowly advanced, keeping his eyes fastened upon hers. Rose struck at him viciously when he came within reach; but he easily avoided the blow, and the next instant he seized her hand, and wrenched the kulfe from her grasp. She sunk upon her couch, and burst into tears of grief over this new defeat.

"Thank you, lady-bird!" said St. Clair. "Hope I haven't hurt you. I can't allow children to meddle with edged tools. Let me see what you have been doing with the knife. He! there is dirt on the blade and on the handle. Three to one you have been digging with it. This must be looked into."

He runninged about the room, and soon found the hole that Rose had dug and carefully conceal d. He pulled away the blanket, and laughed as he looked at it.

"I reckon it's no laughing matter to you, lady-bird," lessi he "It is a pity that those sweet white han he should he to been working so hard in that rough dirt, and all for nothing Perhaps a man might dig his way out of there in a work; but it would be a poor paying business for you, hely-lind."

Rise made no reply, and St. Clair soon went away, after explaining that he had but a few minutes to step, as he was very bury; but that he would seen take her to Galvesten where he would be with her it the three.

Though not at all consoled by this intelligence, Rose was thankful to him for taking himself away. She was so overcome by this last strole, that she was ready to despair. She had been so early disarmed of her only weapon, and St. Chir's no hing words had convinced her that it was hopeless to it input to escape. There was now but one resource. She kneet down, and prayed corn stly. After she had wrapped larself in the blankers, she continued to whisper her sapplications, until while she was yet praying, she fell asl ep.

She could not have told low long she had slept, when she was awaken ddy a noise at the entrance. She started to a helf-sitting post are, but drew back against the wall in affright, as she saw a dork foure discend into the apartment. The figure novel to the fire, farmed the scanty embers, and added note for him he followed to the figure illuminated the room. As the light dished up she saw that the figure was that of an Indian, with blanker, first ers, war-paint, and all the paraphernalia of the savage.

At the sight of this fearful object, she attered a scream, and buried her face in her couch.

"Let my sister not be afrail," said the Indian, speaking in god! English, and in soft and mellow tones. "Her brother is not come to hart her, but to save her."

There was some thing in the voice that touched Rose deeply, a mothing that told her size could trust the speaker. She looked up, smilingly and gratefully, as if she knew that a friend was before her.

"Can this be true?" she exclaimed. "Has God sent you in answer to by proper? Will you take me home?"

"Yersiall goto your father's house. Let my sister arise, tot I may wrap a blanket around her, as the night is cool."

" But there is a mun about here, who was left to wat in me."

" He will never watch any more.". .

A there is a wrapped and indicate, who placed her hand on illegit in that of the savere, and suffered herself to be led to the chimal of A few words, in a tengue unknown to her, pass the two a large on in the outside: a large lag was reach away, and she law the wallt of heaven at we her, stabled with stars. In a few moments she had stepped out into the air, and was free of her prison-house.

Her conductor was joined by another Indian, and she was led away between them. She had gone but a few steps, when she nearly stumbled over the body of a man, and she shuddered as she saw blood on his face.

"Ne-cum-wa was careless," said her Indian guide. "Watch-dogs must be silenced; but we need not run over them."

When they had ascended to the prairie, Rose was placed on a horse, and rode away at a rapid walk, the Indians keeping at her side and directing her course.

Just as day was breaking, she found herself in sight of her father's house, and she did not try to repress the cry of joy and thankfulness that rose to her lips. The Indians stopped, and signified that they could go no further.

"My sister is safe," said the warrior who had come to her in her prison. "Her brothers mest now leave her."

"Do not leave me yet!" implored Rose. "I have not yet thanked you for this great service. Come with me to the house, and let my father and mother thank you."

"Let them thank the Great Spirit. We can not enter the lodge."

"At least, then, tell me your name, that we may know for whom we shall pray.":

The warrior hesitated a moment, then bared his right arm, and held it up before her. Rese saw upon the swarthy skin the mark of a long black arrow, the point toward the hand.

In a moment the two Indians were out of sight, and Rose joyfully galloped home.

CHAPTER IX.

ANOTHER MARKED!

There had been great excitement in March's Settlement and in the adjoining country since the vigilance committee was first talked of. Although that body had not as yet had be any movement, it was generally believed that as soon as the vigilants could complete their organization, and make sure that their strength was sufficient for the occasion, they would strike a decisive blow. This being the case, it was natural that the people in the neighborhood should be interested in the matter, and that they should begin to take sides.

The mysterious death of Roder's men had caused some comment, and a great deal more would have arisen, if it had been known that a similar fate had befallen Mart Simpson; but that occurrence had been kept a profound secret by his friends, who accounted for his absence by saying that he was away on business.

The excitement may be said to have culminated the morning after the events narrated in the last chapter, when two written notices were found posted up in the settlement, on on a large tree that was generally used for posting notices, and the other on the doer of S. Chair's "saloon."

These to these were neller sed to Roder's gang and all other distributions as in March's Settlement and the adjoining country. They stated that the authors of the outrage at Colonel Landry's house were well known, and that, if they would escape punishment, the young hady must be returned to her relatives within two days. If the notice should not be headed, Rober's gang would be declared outlaws, and immediate more research to be taken for their externination and for the suppression of all disorderly persons and establishment. The notices were signal, "By order of the vigilance committee,"

A number of readers are laisteness were attracted to these documents, the who were able to read taking pleasure in deciplering them for the lanefit of these whose education was installed at for the task. Many comments were made upon them, and there were more, in all probability, which it was not considered safe or prudent to utter.

In the group in front of the "saloon" were Paul Roder, Not Whats we and Jim Baker. They had read the notices, and were list ing in silence to the remarks that were made concerning them.

- " Why den't yen pull it down, Roder?" esked a bystander.
- "Why should I? I don't think it worth that much not tice."
  - "I shell have to have my name stack up in that way."
  - "Perlings your name is there. How do you know but you are one of the disorderly persons the note speaks about? I don't know who among us would be safe, if that paper was worth any thing. If any man or set of men has got a grudge against me or my friends, let 'em come out and say it to our faces. They won't find us afraid to meet 'em. Nobody but a coward would sneak about and stick up notices in the dark.

"The fact is," said Roder, when he had walked aside with his two friends, "those vigilance folks have over-hot the mark. If they hadn't put into the notice that stuff about all disorderly persons and establishments, they might have bothered me a little; but they have done us a deal more good than harm."

"How so?" asked Whetstone.

- "More than one man will be for us now, who would have been against us if they had put only Paul Roder and his friends in the notice. What man can say that he mayn't be picked up as one of the disorderly people? We will hold the best hand if they play the game that way, and I wouldn't have one of those notices to ched for a pile."
- "Perhaps you are right; but I don't understand you. You talk very strangely, after what has happened."

." What do you mean?"

"Didn't you know any thing about those notices until this morning?"

"I believe you said something about them last night."

- "Oh, yes. I had forgotten that. I was just in time, it seems."
  - " I don't know what on earth you are talking about."
- "I was just in time to give you a chance to fix it—to straighten it up before the notices came out."

"To fix what? To straighten up what?"

"The girl business. Do you want to make me think that you haven't sent her back?"

"Sent her back! You are crazy, Whetstone."

"My eyes may have lied to me; but I am sure that I saw her, just at dawn this morning, as I was coming to the settlement. She was on a sorrel horse, riding up to her father's house."

"Is this true?" ....

"True as gospel, unless my eyesight has lied to me. I saw her plain enough, and that is what made me wonder at the way you spake about the notices. People will say that you sent her back because the notices frightened you."

am pretty hally hurt. Of course they would say that we were seured. I wouldn't have had such a thing happen for all I hope to get out of that train. Is it possible that Charley has turned her loose? It wouldn't be like him, and he can't have seen the notices, though there's a chance that he may have hear a such thing of them last night."

"Perlogs she turned herself bosse," suggested Whetstone.

"How did she get the horse, then? If she has really gone home, Churley must have turned her loose, and he will have it to answer for."

"I red n you'll find him able to answer fur himself," grund's I Jim Balter. "Here he comes, as if a peraira fire was art r him, and you kin see that he's as wild as a norther."

In fact, it would not be easy to conceive of a more vivid picture of rare, disappointment and terror, than was presented by St. Chair as he came rashing into the settlement. Without stepping to speak to any of his acquainances who greeted him, hat roughly showing aside every one who stood in his way, he hastened to where Roder and his two friends were standing.

"What is the matter, Charley?" asked Roder, as St. Clair was to breathles to speak. "You look as if you had been kicked out of a thun brecloud. Whetstone has just been telling us some bad news."

"Not as Indias I have to tell, you may bet high."

"He says that he saw Landry's girl going home, this morning, just at dawn."

" He saw her! Was she alone?"

" Yes, and riding a sorrel horse."

"In all like to know how the ghost got hold of a sorrel horse."

"The first! What did the ghost have to do with it?"

"Hvery thing. It is Kirby Sparks on guard out there last night. At displicit I went to look after the girl, and there I saw Kirby lying on the ground, down in the arrayo, in front of the hole."

" Dead ?"

"Dead as Davy Crockett! Just like the others. An arrow through his body, his scalp gone, an eye out, and one of those infernal papers pinned on his breast."

"Hush-sh! Not so loud, Charley! Somebody might hear you. Let us go out there."

"You may go; but I have had enough of it. I am going to leave this country."

"Don't be a fool, Charley."

"I am not going out there, and that's flat. I am going to the saloon, to take something to warm me up."

"Batter cool down, if you can. Those folks will suspect that something is the matter, and then they will be sure to find out what it is."

Whetstone and Baker were willing to accompany Roder, and the three left the settlement, avoiding observation as well as they could, and hastened to the hole in the arroyo. There they found the body of Kirby Sparks, as St. Clair had described it.

It was some moments before either of the party spoke. Roder and Baker stood and gazed at the corp.e, and Whetstone stood and gazed at them.

"Charley was right," said Roder at lat. "This is some more of the work of that infernal ghost. No wonder Charley wanted to leave the country. I'm getting tired of this builness. Whose turn will come next?"

"Was this man concerned in the Bin Elood affair?" asked Whetstone.

"Yes. There are four of us left now-Charley, and Lant Pir.le, and Jim Baker, and I.".

"I am serry for you four; but I can't help feeling glad that I am out of the scrape."

"It's a serious matter; but what is to be will be; though that's a death that this child don't like to think of. Let us dig a hole, boys. It is all we can do."

Before the body was laid in the shallow grave, Whetetone had extracted the arrow and wiped it.

"It is a Comanche arrow," he said, "like the others."

Look at it ag'in," sail Baker. "Thar's another fact about that arrer. It's a black arrer."

- " " Tes; it is a black arrow."
- or hear of a chi f named Black Arrer?'
  - "I have hearlef Lim, and I have seen him."
  - " Was he full red?"
  - " I design the was."
  - "Di hi't he allus use black arrers?"
- a Dan't think he did. If he had, I should have heard of
  - "P'rap ye't me wild. That's all I wan'el to know."
- "It was to me, Reber, that our friend Baker is not inclimal to believe in the ghost."
- "Both he didn't see it. He was out on guard that night. He has goes erazy notion into his head about a Communcle chief, as if any Communcle would come down here and plok as off in this style. I don't know but he half believes that Ben Blood has come to life."
- "Jest year let me alone, capin," replied Baker, "and yearing find out, a net time, what my notion really is. I give you the figgers, and you wouldn't count 'em up. I mean to rub my head and take a count at 'em myself."
- "If you had somewhat the rest of us saw, you wouldn't have but one main at ut it. But you may see the ghost you have you get through with your countin. It may be your turn next."
  - " I the end has remarked Whetstone.
- "Come, hous; grabble in the dirt, I want to get away from hore, and think of something else."

The hole was filled, and the three men returned to the setit must, where they found as much excitement as they had left here. It became known that Role Landry had returned to her fallers for any and there was but one opinion concerning her returned at Roler and his men, frightened at the decisors tenestic pointly the vigilance committee, had thought it advisable to give her up.

the national distribution of while returning to the sattlement, us," he said; "but it can't be helped, and we must face it out as well as we can. It will be no joking matter between us and the vigilance folks, 'specially with that infernal ghost, or whatever it is, picking off our men. We have held the best hand all along; but I am not so sure of the cards now, and we must look after the fellows on the fence. If those chaps get a notion that we are scaled, they will go over to the vigilants like a flock of sheep, and then the jig is up with us."

"They will soon find out that the girl has gone home," said Whetstone. "I know what I thought about it, and they will be likely to think as I did."

We must show that we are mad about it. That's not all. We must get her back, or make a bold stroke of some kind, to keep those fence chaps from jum; ing over on the other side. When a man begins to go down hill, every fool is ready to give him a kick. Not a word about Simpson's death, mind you, or this last affair. We've got to keep a stiff upper lip."

At the settlement Roder discovered that St. Clair had drank himself into such a state that he had lost control of his tongue, and it was necessary to quiet him and get him away before he should do damage. This accomplished, Roder had sufficient occupation for the rest of the day, in "keeping a stiff upper lip," and looking after "the fellows on the fence."

Whetstone soon left the settlement, and made his way to Co'onel Lan'ry's. He found the colonel and his family in a state of great wonderment and mystification, and he also perceived that Colonel Landry greeted him coldly, appearing to rerard him with distrust and suspicion.

Rose had related the manner of her ccape, and all were puzzled to guess who her rescuers might have been. Whetsome gave an account of the excitement that prevailed in the settlement, and strongly adviced the policy of representing that Rose had been released and sent home by Roder's men. He represent d that this course would tend to demoralize the law-less party, and to strengthen the hands of the vigilants.

Calcuel Landry listened to this grivice with strong symptoms of distrest, and George Warner soon beckoned his friend ouside, as he wished to speak to him privately.

"Yes," soil Whe stone, in reply to a remark of Warner's concerning Colonel Landry, "I see that he treats me very coolly; but I don't know how I can have effended him."

" He is suspicious of you."

- " What does he suspect?"
- "He sampets that you belong to Roder's gang."
- "Well, and what if I do?"
- " Is it pesible that you are a trait or to us?"
- "I hope I am not. Time will show. In the meanwhile I can only ask you to trust me, and I think that you will trust me, George Warner, wherever else may doubt me."
- "I will. I den't has we why it is; but I feel that I can trust you fully, although there are suspicious circumstances against you."
- "Let them pass. Did you say that they were Indians who rescued Miss Landry?"
  - " Yes"
  - "Dil sie speak to them? Dil they talk English?"
- "One of them did. She be reed him to give her his name, and he raised his hare arm, showing her the mark of a black arrow."
- It is very strange. Perhaps it may not be long before somethings many be explained, that now appear mysterious to you. Although Colonel Landry treats my advice very coldly, I have it to be good advice, and I hope you will cause it to be at that Miss Rose was brought back by two of Roder's men in disguise."

CHAPTER X.

BLACK ARROW HIMSELF.

The night after the release of Role Landry there was a mostly positive visit more committee. Not What tone was there at I Language Saturities was there. What tone was supprised at the process of Saturities as Roler, at his sorrowties, but a ratio 1 that Saturities as Roler, at his sorrowties, but a ratio 1 that Saturities as more was a more way and heap his own could be all the slid not show his supprise by wood or look.

It was some evil but that semething was going on in which neither Whatten: nor Satteriee was permitted to have a share.

There were private caucuses among the other members, and whisperings between them, in which those two were not invited to participate. Satterlee was nervous and uneasy, and it was plain that he did not like the appearance of affairs; but Whetstone was cool, calm, and quiet as usual.

These two may have noticed that nothing was said aloud that might not have been made known to the world, and almost nothing was done in the way of business, until Captain Ferguson arose, called the meeting to order, and began to speak in low and deliberate tones.

"It has been known," he said, "since the formation of this body, that information of its deliberations, its plans, the names of the gentlemen who compose it, has been regularly conveyed to a set of lawless men whom I feel justified in mentioning as the enemy. While such a state of things lasts, it is impossible for us to act effectively. We will only expose ourselves to danger and humiliation if we do not plan and deliberate with entire secrecy. It has been proposed, in view of these things, that all the members present take a solemn oath of secrecy, which will be hereafter administered to those who are not here present. We will now a ljourn to the place that has been gelected as the proper spect for administering the oath."

There was no gain-aying this determination, which came in the form of an order, rather than a suggestion. As they walked out of the house, a close observer might have noticed that Satterlee looked anxious and troubled. It would not have required a close observer to perceive that Satterlee and Whetstone were placed in the middle in the order of marching, so that there was no chance for them to high behind or to drop out. It was evident, in fact, that the proceedings of this meeting had be no cut and dried," that the whole affair was conducted according to a pre-arranged plan.

They walked in period silence, a distance of half a mile from the houre, to the control a grove of close timber, where they halted, and ominous preparations were at once made for a liministering the oath. A rope, with a noise at one call, was thrown over a branch of a large oak. The other only was made fast to the three, and an empty barrel was placed on end under the noise.

"You see that rope," sail Captain Ferguson, pointing at the that we have not betrayed any of the secrets of this organization, and that we will be reafter keep them faithfully. If any man swears falsely, I pi y him. As the chairman of the committee, I will be the first to take the oath."

With this pithy speech, the captain mounted the barrel, and put his head in the noise, which was tightened around his need. An oath was then administered to him, in substance such as held a lower the l. No man who had ever disclosed any of the sorts of the organization could take such an oath without forswearing himself.

But Captain Forga in took it, and then one after another stand up on the barrel, until the outh had been administered to all exert Sutted in and Whetstone.

"It is your turn now," said Ferguson, turning to Satterlec. .

That individual trendled and turned pale. He looked are in I for a may of example, but saw him elf a trounded by earnest and determined men.

ation. "Tals is a flaced up job. I we seen it from the beginning. Yet want to murder no, and that's the upshot of this whole presenting."

"If y have a true man," said Captain Ferguson, "you can not till to the outh which we have all taken. If you are a spy, you deserve death."

I was a guidence, and I have risked as much in this be in the season of you. You can't prove any thing against me, and there is no law for this. Give me a fair trial, and I will so init to the result of it. If you marder the, you will suffer for it."

"It is exilent that you are guilty. If we needed any "Will you be not take the eath? I am willing to take it.

I can take it as well as any of you."

What he did you so have certaity with a lie on your Mark You shall have ten minutes to say your prayers. Dind Satterlie was slized, and his arms were tied behind his back. He saw that his down was fixed, and he kneeled to his executioners, be eaching them to spare his life. But he groveled and begged and raved and threatened in vain. He was surrounded by men who were terribly in carnest, who had banded together to free the land from a great planue, to secure the safety of themselves, their families and their property. They believed it to be their duty to make an example of this man, and were determined to perform their duty, cost what it might.

"Your ten minutes are up," said Captain Ferguson, returning his watch to his pocket. "Up on the buriel with him!"

The poor wretch was seized by strong arms, and, in spite of his struggles and shricks, was raised up on the barrel, and the noose was tightened around his neck. The next instant the barrel was kicked out from under him, and he was swinging in the air.

During this procedure the circle closed about Whetstone, and knives were drawn, and pistols were cocked. But he cave no heed to these preparations, surveying the scene before him with an appearance of entire indifference. His single eye was as unshrinking, and his countenance was as undismayed as ever. A stalwart man, a match for any two of the e who surrounded him, he might have broken through their ranks and dashed away. Perhaps the drawn knives and cocked pistols deterred him; but he did not seem to notice them, nor did he show, by look or movement, any desire to sur from the ground on which his feet were planted.

After hanging about twenty minutes, in perfect silence, the body of Satterice was lowered to the ground, and the reservas carefully removed from his neck. The burrel and the rope were then restored to their former positions.

" Now, sir," sail Captain Ferguson, turning to Whetstope.

The person a little sed quietly stepped forward, without heteraying any emotion, mounted the barrel, and put his head in the neare. This movement created considerable surprise, which found went in whitpers and murmars; but the grants still closed in around him.

George Warner, who had been regarding his friend in silence, but with great interest, quickly stepped forward.

"He is innocent, Captain Forgroom!" exclaimed Warner.
"He is a true man. I will go bail for him with my life"

"Are you really to take the oath?' asked Ferguson, with-

"I chait take that outh," replied Whetstone. "I am one of R I r's men, and have told him some matters that have nappened at your meetings."

We have that you have been very intimate with Roder. No man construction masters; but my young friend, Warner, has the ight that you may be able to explain your conduct. Here you any explanation to make?

" None at all."

"What do you mean?" eagerly asked George Warner, as he again spring forward. "You don't mean to say that you are a traiter? I would not believe it if you should swear to it. Tell the grouple the truth, whatever it is. I can not see you die such a death."

What is the use? I have spoken the truth. I can't take that with One double is as good as another. I came here to do something, but am tired already."

. George Warner sank up in his knees, and covered his face with his hands.

"Why you should not suffer the same fate as that rascally spy who lies before you?"

"I have her ing to say; but, as my friend seems to be so hally trained he had show you something. I warn him, however if you have he may to sorry for it."

"What have you to show?" taked Perguson, as George

Warner looked up.

When her I his right arm, and held it up. All could so in the lim noull ghe, a long black arrow printed on the ship to paint a wat this hand to fit What rand Caloud Linky raded to him and emtradition. In a star measure the rope was bould from Link 1, wells we hived to the ground.

" Y parations wor of R of exclaimed Warner, "Why did you not tell us before?"

you to he proposed that you know it now, as I can not expect you to he proposed to have a labored that mark to save my life, as you were so unalling that I should die; but it would have been better for you and for me if the barrel had been pushed from under me."

"What do you mean? I am sure that your death would not benefit me. Why would it have been better for you?"

"There are harder deaths than hanging, as I have good reason to know. One side has had its turn at me, and I may not get off so easy with the other. I feel sure that a blood-hound is on my trail."

"You need not meet those men again. You need not go back among them. Come to Colonel Landry's house. Rose will be so glad to thank you for her life, and there is so much that we wish you to explain."

"But it can not be explained. If I live I will explain it before many days." If I die, it will be better for you. I will thank you if you will let me go now, as I have important basiness to attend to."

There was nothing to restrain him, except the entreaties of Warner and Colonel Landry, and Whetstone walked swiftly away.

The body of Lawrence Satteriee was again lung up, after a paper had been pinned on its breast, with this inscription:

A SPY.

By order of the Vigilance Committee.

CHAPTER XI.

THE OTHER SIDE.

When store was in leed in a heavy when he left his friends of the vigilance committee. He walked away very rapilly, and without stopping to look back; but there was a trendled expression in his fire. In fact, he doubted whether he eight to go, and he went quickly, in order that the doubt might be settled in that way.

The important business of which he had spoken was an engagement with Roder's men—an engagement to assist them in attacking and plundering the train of which Roder had nulle so much rokening. He may or may not have believed in pre mineres; but he certainly felt one. He was sure that some ing was about to happen, and it was rea and b that he shall far word will, rather than expect good. It would be made est refer him to remain with his friends of the viriling committee, with whom suspicions had given place to graditible, to receive the thanks of Rom Landry and her per uts, to be well cut rudnel and kindly treated, than to ii t him. If an my these oullaws, of whom one at lesst, he was sare, I shal upon him with unfriendly eyes. But he had started to carry out a definite and pre-arranged plan, and he felt that he must go threath with it, what ever might be the rit. Beiles there were others depending on his movements, and he he within he could not to displaint them. Therefor it was that he walked rapilly away from temptation.

lies ar achel his hers, which he hall but in the woods I. I From L's re. d., L. chiel and rode away at full speci. He mise as if for was driving him on relisticity, and to Wind was he going? He knew not, and his brow clouded as the present of earl again came over him.

His ruil ralling brom ht him, about an hour before day, to the rules as at which he was to meet Rober and his men. He found them whiting there -some two dozen of them-waitin a patiently and heiser by, as if they had not been anxious contained his arrival, and had not cared whether he came exists have Samewere to play, a mere seated illy by the fire, a new to perming their arms in order, some were continue of the Minter that the state menty all were paying more or later to a promer as lateral condens that were scattered about the encampment.

In the appearance of - lefter the lefte decention they can upon him : in the first the Leader William to the last to the form the diin the list the president which has i lii. . . . I linto put a wron interpretation ; the in the His heralish was only monantry; he Lutain in link the sum of procurtical three joining his Carlo Hell nat tie hie her, but this wither beit. er a being light, so that it could be easily lossened. He then this will his well compoure, and exchange greetings with the men.

"Glad to see you at last," said Roder, with something of a sneer. "Better late than never, I suppose. That's the old saying at least."

"I hope I haven't delayed you, or put you back in any of your plans."

"Not a bit of it. Time enough yet, as the man said when they wanted to hang him. We didn't expect to start before daybreak, and one man more or less would make hardly any difference, except in dividing the plunder."

"You may be sure that I will want my share of that."

"So we reckoned, and I hope you may get it. Sit down by the fire, and make yourself comfortable. You will need something warming after riding in the night-air, and here's plenty of the O-be-joyful."

Whetstone could not fail to notice, as he seated himself near the fire, that the men at once commenced to crowd around him, and he soon found him elf the center of a circle. All were looking at him and at Roder, in a grim sort of expectancy. But he give no sign of being discomposed by their proceedings, and quietly took a sip from the black bottle that was handed him.

"As you ought to feel better now," remarked Roder, "we would like to hear what kept you so late, if you've no objection to telling us."

"None in the world. It is my duty to tell you, though it is bad news that I bring. I have been among the regulators again, and have found it a rather serious business."

"Serious, was it? You seem to have come out of it safe enough.';

"Yes; but there was another man who was not so backy. I told you that you had not better send Satterbee among them arain, that he wasn't playing the game right, and that he middle get into trouble."

"I remember that you spoke about it, and I meant to give him warning, but forgot it. What sort of trouble has be got into?"

"He is in no trouble now, and never will be again in this world."

"You don't mean to say that they have killed him?"

"That is just what I do mean to say. They harged him to a tree."

"Poor fellow! He was never of much account, and was of mighty little use to us; but he was a friend of ours, and those folks will have to pay for that job. Tell us all about it, Whetstone."

Whetstone described the occurrence quite accurately, and with sufficient detail to satisfy his auditors; but his narrative came to a pause at the death of Satterlee.

"And so they hanged him as a spy," said Roder. "Well, it's no more than we would do if we should catch a spy. What's fair for one is fair for t'other. Don't you think so, "Whetstone?"

"I suppose you are right about that. People who put themselves in such a position must take the consequences."

"Of course they must, and they're mighty apt to get them, too. But that won't his der us from taking our revenge for per r Satterle. He's not the only one of our friends who has gone under lately, and we've got to be revenged for all of them, on somebody."

"Thuse regulators seem to be in earnest."

"They had better be; but that won't save them. The cowardly skunks! It is easy enough for them to string up a man when they are twenty to one; but they don't dare to met us in a fair fight. And so they jerked Satterlee right up to a tree. How did you get out of the scrape, Whetstene? You couldn't take that each, I recken, without some pretty tall lying."

"But I could do some tall lying to get ril of taking it."

"Di ln't they make you take the oath, then?"

"No, in leed. The whole affair was got up for Satterlee's benefit. It was a cut- n l-dri I arrangement, as he told them. They had series told and watched him, and they had proof each to arrive him to satisfy them."

"Dan't years appose that some body informed a rain thim?"

"Not sly but the asselves, as far as I could learn. I told you that he called know how to play the game. He only cannot be the needless, and neither did nor said any thing. Any one could see that he only came there to look and to listen, and it is no winder that they suspected him."

"And you were not supected at all?"

"Oh yes; their sericions were pretty strong; but I talked them down, and made all square. They believe that I am one of their best friends and helpers."

"What fools they must be! But you are a powerful hand, Whetstone, to pull the wool over people's eyes. No doubt of that. And you get off safe, and didn't show your hand at all?"

"Show my hand!" exclaimed Whetstone, with a start.

"What do you mean by that?"

"You dishit let them know what kind of a game you were playing. What else should I mean?"

"Come, now, cap'n," growled Jim Baker, who had been listening impatiently to this colloquy. "Let's git to business.

I'm tired of this durned palaver."

"You had better mind your own business, Jim Baker, and leave me to mind mine," curtly replied Roder. "I reckon I know how to do what I've got afore me."

" So ye ort; but it's a pity we can't do suthin' without so much jaw."

"Hold your own jaw then. I wanted Whetstone to tell me the rights of this affair, and he has done it. Now I've got a little story to tell him, if he cares to hear it."

"A story?" inquired Whetstone. ....

"Yes-a sort of a yarn. Suppose we take a nip before I login."

Whetstone took a slight sip from the black bottle, and Roder took a deep draught. The Lystanders showed the force of example by applying their lips to their bottles and canteens, with the exception of Baker, who grumbled and muttered impatiently. Roder set down the bottle, and proceeded as follows:

"You see that Jim Belor there. He ain't such a fool as 1 - books to be. You might take him for a bix fool when he is quiet, and for a heap bixer feel when he sets his jew to runnin'; but you might be everly tin'ly mistaken. You know that our men has been droppin' off lately, in a way that we don't like at all, and a way that we can't understand—unless it may be the ghost; for we are all ready to swear that we saw the ghost, except Jim F. For, who won't believe in the ghost, because he didn't see it himself. But I know for sartin, whatever may happen, that I saw that gho t, and so did Fancy Charley, and so did some of the rest of us."

Jim Baker here showed such violent symptons of impatience, that Rober invited him to come and "take a nip" with him, to wash down but follings, a pring him that he would "come to the plant" very some This business sould, Rober resumed his "little story."

If the laws, that they had been shot with Comanche arrows. You no icel that, and Jim Baker, who had been among the Comanches, the I with you; but he went further than you did. He is that the arrows were black, and he had hear I of a Comanche chief who was name! Black Arrow, and who was part white. He made a regular puzzle of it, did Jim, and told me to put it together; but I couldn't make nothin' of it, except that Jim was a fool. I allowed I had laughed him cut of his giver nothins; but the old hardhead, instead of givin' them up, at in to work them out in his own way. Let's drink to that old hardhead. Talkin' is dry work."

Whatstone felt his presentiment more strongly than ever, and was sire that Rader was about to make some unpleasant disclosure concerning himself; but he showed no emotion, and quictly paid his requests to the lattle

"What does that old har head do," continued Roder, "thinkin' hold got on the trail, but go, this very night, that's nearly call how, up to Fergu h's ranch. He hadn't been there has, hillin' about, he for he saw a lot of folks come out of the house, and he followed them until they came to a halt in the timbor. He should alout till he found a good hilling place, where he could so all that was goin' on and hear most of it. He will man just what you have told man; so you see I have that just have he'd in a good hilling told what you did, and a little more."

st has a line Bloom I forward, and also good insequiningly at the same face. But, if Nat Whetstone felt particularly is mill right at that mean it, as well be might, his countenance showed no such feeling.

"Well; and what mere lid Baker tell you?" he asked, straining as calmly as ever.

on the barrel, and put his lead in the nesse. He said that he couldn't take that oath, because he was one of Roder's men, and had told the secrets of the vigilance folks. That was fair and square, and all they had to do then was to ask him if he had anythin' to say ag'inst bein' hung as a spy. He allowed he hadn't; but he concluded at last, though he couldn't say any thin', that he might show somethin'. Then he held up his right arm."

"And what of that?" coolly inquired Whetstone, as Roder paused and looked at him.

"Jim Baker was lookin' close, and there was a streak of moonlight ag'inst the arm just then, and he saw a long black arrow marked on it."

"And what of that?".

"Then the vigilance committee ran up to him, and hugged him, and made a heap of him."

"And what of that?"

"Why, you are the man!"

"Very well. That's no news to me. What does it prove?"

"It proves that you are found out. It proves that you have been a spy ag'inst us all the time, while pretendin' to be a spy for us. It proves that Jim Baker knows now who Black Arrow is, and that we know who killed our men and let that gal loose."

To the astoni-hment of Roder and Baker, if not all the rest, Nat Whetstone leaned back, and burst into a roar of laughter. But while he was indulging in this untimely mirth, his one eye was busily engaged in seeking a loophole for retreat in case of an emergency.

"I did not think that you could be such a fool, Paul Roder," he said. "To pay Baker for having Lucked at his proze a while ago, you are now ready to believe the most abourd and monstrous notion he can invent. I will tell you what that thing proves. It proves that I played my part well—so much better than Satterlee played his, that I am alive and free, while he is dead. Did you never before see a man with a mark on his arm? I have seen hundreds of them, and an arrow makes a very nice mark. The Comanches did that for me. Does it follow, because I have an arrow marked on my arm, that I have shot those black arrows through Mart Simpson and the other men? You might as well accuse me, if I Lappened to have a wooden leg, of being old Santa Anna. I told you that I had made those regulators believe me to be one of their lest friends and helpers, and Baker has only proved that I told you the truth. I did it in my own way, of course. It is no man's business what that way was, as long as it answered the purpose.",

Logic. 77

There was silence for a few moments after this speech. The I didness of Whetstone and his confident demeanor, raised a doubt in the mind of Roder as to whether the accused was really guilty as charged by Baker. He was stargered, if not convine he The reasonableness of Whetstone's argument, and the perfect collines with which he treated the accusation as an atter absurdity, had an effect upon others besides Roder. They were good enough logicians to perceive that the fact of his being marked with a black arrow did not prove that he had kind and scalped the men who had been lost, and that the fact of his being on good terms with the regulators did not prove that he was false to Roder's gang. Not being able to answer his argument, they were silent.

Jim Baker was silent, also, but not because he had nothing to say. He keek barond had grantly at the others, noticing their change of countenance. He was ready to say his say; but his anger mastered his speech for the manner. The access I gave him an opportunity.

"You know that Jim Baker has lets of queer notions," said Whetst he, "and this is one of the queerest he ever invented. I halt so how any man could really believe, for a minute, such a crary in a cut-of-the way notion."

"Cray is it?" Goulated Jon Baker, as he rose to his feet.
"Any main with half an eye him see that it's true, in spite of year high Man White I have a powerful hand to pail wood over followed as Paul Robers ys; but you kain't blind this old he s. Why dilled Locky and that Warner chap run up to you and har powerful who is her has and they knowed you to be the non. Yes; and that's is t what the young chap said. I dilled think to tell that fore; but I remember it now. You ha the gall had be find the him. I herd you say that you knowed a blockhand was en your trail. You war right about that, and replied Whetstone, with equal warmth.

"If you are not Sam Houston, who in thunder are you?"

"I am Jim Baker, and I ain't ashamed of my name."

" You are an infernal fool!"

"No rascally say shall call me that twice!" exclaimed Baker, as he rusical upon Waststone.

The latter dart it forward as he rose to meet his adversary, and caught him are mit the waist. With a gigantic effort he threw the stalwart backwoolsman clear over his head. But Baker, as he performed his summersault, snatched at his opponent's top-knot, and, to the surprise and consternation of all, the hair came off in a mass, leaving the crown of Whetstone's head as bare as an egg. The loss of his latir made a great transformation in the man, and tho i who were near him fell back as if a ghost had started up before them.

"Bun Brood!" exclained Roder and several others.

"I knowed it!" shouted Baker, as he strayd d to his feet.

It was not for nothing that Nat Whetstone's single eye had been roving around, seeking a chance to break the circle of which he was the center. He knew the weakest point, and used his knowledge instantaneously. Hardly had Roder exclaimed "Ben Blood!" when he burst through the ring, flinging aside, before they could think of opposing him, two men who stood in his way.

Roder and his men had hardly recovered from their amazement, when the fugitive reached his horse. It was but the work of an instant to slip the brille, mount, and drive his spurs into the animal's flanks. Crack went half a dozen lifes, and the ballets flow around him as he rode off at a territe gallop; but he was safe, and was soon so far away that the thought of pursuit was aban longly.

CHAPTER NII.

THE CARAVAN.

A CARAVAN was slowly wending its way across the upper forks of Trinity river. It was not a large caravan, comprising only of the wazers, of which two belonged to emigrants, and the others to traders. Two traders owned the wagons in partnership—John Wilson, from Mississippi, and Tom Bulkley, from nowhers in particular. The emigrants were from Mississippi, and the families were those of Nathan Boyd, with his wife and his son Henry and daughter Miriam, and of Samuel Ryan, who his two grown sons and three daughters. There was a tent for to each of the traders' wagons, making, in all, thirteen men attached to the caravan.

It was a small force with which to traverse the vast wilderness of northern Texas; but no dancer was apprehended, except from In II has, and it was believed the rifles of the party would be a sufficient protection against any bands of savanes that might be in to Had John Wilson supposed that there could be any real langer, he would have employed more man, and we delicate paid them out of his own purse, for the sake of Miriam Bord, whose long black hair was much too precious to ornament the wignerm of a savage.

As the current was about to eros the west fork, the last of the test is clear, a solitary horsenan came in sight, who was it is equal to be an Indian, but was recognized as a which also a party view. He robe up to the party without my highly more remark, announcing his name as B.H. Sill, and life on that of a hunter and trapper. Having view is information, he proceeded to fraternize with the conjumy in true hunt its style, and was liberally regulation to a jumy in true hunt its style, and was liberally regulation to the wagons.

of he is ther unlike a printed, and made himself so useful in helping to cross the wagons over the water, that his entertainers were highly pleased with him, and declared that he was a most valuable acquisition to their party.

It was near sunset when the entire caravan was safe on the other side of the fork, and the leaders begun, as usual, to consult concerning a camping-place. Wilson was in favor of a spot on the rolling prairie, clear of timber, about half a mile from the fork, as they had been accustomed to select op a and elevated situations, as the best for defense in case of passible attack.

Beil Sparks, however, scouted the idea of danger, and strongly advised his new friends to camp where they were.

"Hyar's yer water," he sail, "and hyar's plenty of wool. Thar's no airthly reason why ye should go a mile from wool and water fur a campin'-place. I'll bet a pack of beavers to a coon-skin that ye couldn't find a red-skin within fifty mile. Take the advice of a man who knows this stretch of kentry, and stop whar ye are."

The hunter soon won the greater part of the company to his views, and John Wilson, thinking the matter of not much consequence, easily abandoned his opinion, and it was settled that the camp should be by the river.

Perhaps Wilson would not have yielded the point without a little more argument, if he had not caught sight of Miriam Boyd, strolling alone by the lank of the river, and he was anxious to join her. He acquiesced very readily, therefore, in the opinion of his friends, and ha tened to overtake the young lady—for Miriam was still young and han bome, although she had reached the marriageable age nearly ten years before she crossed the west fork of the Trinity.

"Why, John, you frightened me," she said, turning quickly as she heard his step behind her. "Where did you come from?"

"From the warons, of course. You must have been very busy with your own thoughts, or you would have heard me; for I made noise enough in coming."

"You have come to tell me that they are ready to start, I suppose. It is very kind of you."

"There is nothing to thank me for. The wagons will not start before marning. We are to camp by the river"

1. . 1

"On the low ground? It is strange. You have never chosen such a camping-place before."

"I did not choose it this time, Miriam, and, to tell the truth, I am not half pleased with the selection that has been made. But the hunter who came into camp this evening laughed at the notion of going up onto the prairie, and the other fellows overruled me."

"You ha't think it is safe, then, to camp by the river?"

"It is safe enough, I suppose. Sparks says that there are no red skins anywhere near us, and he ought to know. I don't like it, though, Miriam. I may be foolish; but I think we eight to run no risks. Nearly all I am worth is in this venture, and a great deal more than I am worth rides in one of the wagons."

Mirium blushed; for Wilson had bowed to her, as if his shadon was not sufficiently pointed.

"Is not were worth mean me," she said; "but I am not worth your notice. I wish you would not think of me in that way. I wish you could feel toward some one else as you seem to feel toward me."

but you, and that I can never love any other. But you had walked out here to think of Ben Blood, and you were so wrapped up in your thoughts that you did not hear me when I can sup. Will you never forget him? I am not likely to forget him, as long as I bear the mark of his knife; but I owe him no gradge for that. I would not speak to you on this enject a rule, if I the ight that he might be living, that you might yet see him."

"Am I me going the sak him? We will see Geerge War-now, as it is now will surely have some news of him."

"I pray God, though the prayer goes sorely against the grain with me, that you may that him alive, and that, if he is alive, you may not disappointment."

". "What do you mean, John?"

Modifies; but there are so many chances and changes in this wird. I wish you would promise me, Miriam, that you will is my wife if you find that Ben Blood is dead, or if—but no matter about that. I should think you might promise me as much as this."

"Wait till we reach our journey's end. Do not a k me to promise any thing until I have a chance of learning something definite about him. I know you are too generous, John, to press me in this matter now. Hark! my mother is calling me, and it is getting late."

"I won't bother you any more, Miriam. Let us go back to the wagons. The more I think about this camping-place, the more I don't like it.—I have a great mind to change it, and let them laugh at me as they will."

Not seeing Beli Sparks about the camp when he returned, John Wilson inquired what had become of kim, and was told that he had gone away as soon as the camp was located.

"We pressed him to have supper with us, and to stay all night," said Bulkley; "but he told us that he had a hunting partner waiting for him down the river, and must go to meet him, or his comrade would give him up for deal. So he mounted his mustang, and rode away in a hurry."

Such a proceeding seemed rather strange to Wilson, and he expressed his thoughts. The man had had time enough to drink with them, to help them across the river, and to argue half an hour about a camping-place, and it was strange if he could not stay a little longer. Wilson went on to inform his friends that he did not at all like to camp in the river bottom. The more he thought of it, the more he disliked it, and he wanted them to change the location.

There was some grambling and discrisfaction at this request, but Wilson was the leader of the party, and was accustemed to have his own way, and the stranger who had laughed at danger was no longer there.

"There is danger everywhere," sail Wilson. "We will never to e any thing by being to particular; but we may lose every thing by not being particular enough. We have always pilled a safe place to camp, and there is no realon why we should break our rule now. As we are getting near the end of our journey, we ought to be more careful than ever. It would go hard with us to cross the ocean, and he wrecked in sight of port. There may be no Indians within fifty miles of us; but I knew of a field in Missis ippit that no stray coule ever came near during a whole season, until a gap was left in the fence one night, and the next morning there were a down cows in the com. I have heard that there are white men in this country, who are as beel as any roleskies, if not worse," Wilson corried his point, as he usually did when he was in correct. The cattle were put to the wagons, not without a little word ling, and the catavan moved on to the prairie. When they reached the spot selected by Wilson, it was night. The wagens were at one corraled, the animals were secured, to be a side works. It was just like John Wilson's obstinacy, the means id, to use more precaution than he had ever yet as I, simply because it had been said that there was no danger.

ITHE SELECTION

The night wore away without any appearance of danger, and the leigh was against Willen when he came to take his turn at mounting guard. Many were the jokes and gibes of the relievely utinely, who were jolly at the prospect of wrappling themselve in their blankets and enjoying a comfortable section.

"Longh as much as you please," said Wilson. "I don't care what fun you poke at me, as long as we are safe. I had rather he houghed at than here my we wons. We have come so for in perfect safety, and I am not food on a sh to risk any thing at the last.":

The night was clear and iright after the moon rose. It was prefern by quiet, and cars, as well as eyes, could reach for on such a night; but there was nothing to be seen or heard outsilly of the camp, and it was not such a night as savages would choose for an attack.

Jun Winn wilked around the camp, or leaned against a wagen, thinking of Miriam B yd, and hoping that he might yet win her. He was glad that his precautions had proved under the large that he had taken them.

Were they, in lock unnece ary? Wilson's moditations were interrupted by the whinnying of a horse in the direction of the river. He had his car to the ground, and could hear to stumping of horses and the voices of men. The nelessor ment their first eamp, near the river-bank. A party was the remains or friends, it was necessary to be prepared for the worst.

Calling one of the sentinels, Wilson told him of what he had heard, and directed him to quietly waken the camp. In a few minutes all the men were on their feet, with their rifles in their hands, and were posted in concealment behind the wagons, ready to give a warm reception to an enemy.

CHAPTER XIII.

WHITE AND RED INDIANS.

HARDLY were the preparations for defense completed, when a body of horsemen came in sight, approaching the camp from the river. A nearer view showed that they were white men.

"They are at least two to our one," said Wilson. "We shall have a hard tussle."

"What do you mean?" asked Tom Bulkley. "Don't you see that they are white men? Of course they are friends."

" "That don't follow."

"You are the most suspicious man I ever knew. Any one but you would be sure that they are friends."

"I tell you, Tom, there are white men in these parts who are wilder and worse than any red skins."

"There is Bill Sparks, our hunter friend, among them.

Don't you recognize him?"

"Well enough. He had his own reasons, no doubt, for wanting us to camp down yonder. See! they have broke into a trot. They are going to charge us."

"You are going crazy, John."

As soon as the party were near enough, John Wilson rose and hailed them.

"Keep off, till you tell us who you are! Halt, there, or we will fire into you!"

He was answered by a volley—not of bullets, but of oaths—and the horsemen pressed forward at a gallop.

aim, boys, and leave that rascally Spanks for me."

Wilson's friends still found it burt to believe that he was right, until a couple of shots were discharged at their leader, who was the only person visible from beyond the camp. Then they took good aim, and a stream of fire was poured forth from behind the wagons.

The fire caused no little destruction, not among the men, but among the horses. Bill Sparks was knocked off his horse, and end or two more were wo inded; but it was the havocament of the heres, can d by the low aim of those behind the warons, that made the charge a failure. So many animals were down, or careering about without their riders, that they were in the way of those who were still mounted. The advance was stopped, and the assailants were glad to get out of reach of another volley.

Wilson. "That fellow Sparks was a spy. It was his business to see our strength, and to put us on a camping ground where they would have a good chance at us. They expected to find us down you ler, and were as made as rattlers when they came up here at us."

"They got a pretty good dose," remerked Henry Boyd.

"Not enough to cure them. That spy is sattled, I think; but the others are likely to give us as much trouble as we can stand up under."

Will on was right, as usual. These white Indians went to work in much the same manner as red Indians were accusting 1 to. They had hope I to surprise the camp, or to take it at a distribute. Dispointed in this, they had attempted a grand right which had resulted in failure. As the red Indians were accusting them six a distribute done, they then attacked on all sides, concending thems is a behind such cover as they could find.

This was a game at which both sides could play. Those in the camp were sheltered by their warons, and by bales of go ds and other articles, of which they had made a breast-work; while their a callants had only the inequalities of the ground and the little had a their they exceed in the soft prairie if; int the latter alvate disteadily, and their fire was one pullar, equalably as it was concentrated upon the camp from all directions.

It was not buy before one of the team ters was killed, Willson was hit in the leg, and two others were slightly wounded. Still the white Indians gradually approached the camp, and affairs began to look blue for its defenders. While matters were in this condition, the attack scenned to be gradually concentrated on the side next to the river, and the wagoners gradually concentrated there to meet it. Then it was that Jahn Wilson, who had just bound up his lag, called to his friends to hasten to the other side, as the real attack was about to be made at that point.

Over they went, pell-mell, leaving but three or four to answer the fire of the enemy on the slope. Sure energh, a dezen men were riding toward the camp as fast as their hor es could carry them. To the astonishment of those who had humber to meet them, a few rifle-shots were sufficient to send these bold riders to the right about, and they went of without a wound;

John Wilson was wrong, for once. The attack of the horsenen was only a feint. He had hardly finished wendering at the easy root of the enemy, when the cross of his companions on the other side tell him that the men on the slope had burst into the camp. All hastened to drive them expand the struggle was a hard one, though finally successful. The as allents were driven out, bearing off all their worness, except one man, who had crawled under a wagon.

This temporary victory was dearly perchased by the defenders of the camp. Six of them were down, including Wilson, who had received a much more serious wornd than that in his leg. He was carried to a place of comparative suffry, and his wound was looked to by Miriam Boyd, all the mean being needed for fighting.

"But enough, Miriam," he said, in answer to her quartical concerning his wornd. "I am afraid that we will never a taway from here alive. It is not likely that I will, and I am fearful for the rest of you. Those wretches want car plander, and man to have it. I would wish it all such in the said your life taight he spared. We can never stand another rush like that. Are they coming again?"

"Never mind them now. Let me first attend to your wound."

"Look, Miriam! I must know whether they are com-

"Yes! The horsemen are coming on again. No! These are not the same. I am sure they are not. Is it possible that they are Indians? Ah! what a fearful cry!"

then. They are Indian and there must be more than twenty of them. We are between hawk and brizzard now, and I wish the two birds of proy would end it by killing each other. Let me down. I am too weak to sit up."

"They are running!" exclained Miriam. "The white men are running. The savates have charged upon them, and are chasing them in all directions."

This intelligence was confirmed by Henry Boyd, who came running up to tell his leader what had happened, and to wonder, as the others wendered, what they were to do.

"We can cally trust in Providence," replied Wilson. "Look ort, and tell me all that is going on."

It was a rout of the white savages by the red savages, and the form r, as Miriam had said, were being driven in all directions. Soon a warrior separated himself from the Indians, and rode up to the camp.

"Dai't shoot!" he shouted, as Tom Bulkley's rifle was point I at him. "Don't you see that we are your friends, that we have have driven off your enemies? I am a white man, as well as you."

Buildey bewered his weapon, and welcomed this deliverer into the camp. He was at once taken to John Wilson, who was nearly tringing from less of blood.

"They tell me that you are a white man," said Wilson.

"Are these other In lians white men, too ?"

"They are genuine Cemanches; but they have come to help you are diest the g white savages who have nearly made an end of you here."

"White or red, you have saved us, and you will find that we are grateful."

Note: miled that now. Let me look at this wound of

"Tell me your name, then."

" You may call me Black Arroy."

Elich Arras dress l Wilson's wond in cool style, and hard to assist the other men who had been hart. In the mean time the Comanches returned from pursuing the white fugitives, and were heartily welcomed to the camp. Tom Bulkley treated them freely to liquors, and distributed cheap presents among them quite liberally. In fact, the red warriors were lionized and made much of, although dripping scalps were hanging from the belts of some of them. Their entertainers did not object to the scalps, so long as they were the scalps of their enemies.

Black Arrow showed no little emotion while he was moving about the camp, succoring the wounded and dressing their hurts. He often looked at Miriam Boyd; but it must have been the painful wounds, not her sweet face, that troubted him so much. One of the assailants who had been wounded was dragged out from under a wagon, and the attention of the impromptu surgeon was called to him. As Black Arrow looke i at this man, there was a savage expression on his features.

"Hallo! You hyar!" exclaimed the wounded man.
"You've got me now, and I reckon you'll be fur raisin' my ha'r."

"I will dress your wound first, Jim Baker."

The chief suited the action to the word, giving the guilty as much care as he had given the innocent, and not a word was spoken between them until the operation was performed.

"You are a queer cues," then said Baker. "I kein't rightly make you out; but I reckon I kin guess yer notion. You want to save me for the tortur"."

" Would that be any wors than you treated me?"

"Don't know as it would. But I mought tell you suthin' you would like to know. It's about the Landry folks."

"What about them? Are they in danger?"

"Reckon they are. I will tell you, of you promise to see me safe out of this scrape, so that I kin try to lead a better life."

"I will promise, if you will speak the truth; but you must also promise not to mention my name to any one here."

"It was agreed among us to take our revence out of chil Landry and his fills. Charley St. Charley St. Charley us up to it; but Roder and the rest were willin' enough. As soon as this job could be got over—whether it worked well or not—they war goin' over to March's Settlement to raise particlar thunder.

They allowed that this kentry is growin' too hot fur 'em, and they meant to take that gal of Landry's fur Charley, and to cl'ar out with what plunder they kin git holt of. I make no doubt that they're on the way now."

Black Arrow stopped only to look at John Wilson, who was sinking rapidly, and to speak a few words to Bulkley, who had taken his partner's place as leader of the caravan. Then he collected his red warriors and rede off at full speed.

CHAPTER XIV.

READY TO STRIKE.

The vigilance committee had not been idle after the execution of Lawrence Satterlee. George Warner, with his accustomed impetuosity, urged them to do something, declaring that they never would be more ready to strike than they were.

If they should not combine and attack the enemy, the en-

Even Colonel Landry was convinced that timid counsels ought no longer to prevail, and preparations were at once made for war. Warrants were procured against certain persons who were known to have committed crimes, and the entire force of the vigilance committee set forth, in strong array, as a procedure to execute the warrants. To their great surprise, when they reached the settlement the birds had flown. Neither Paul Roder, nor any man who could be suspected of being connected with him, was to be found there, and the grand in exement of the regulators was necessarily a failure.

As there could be no battle without an enemy, the army valiantly marched back to Colonel Landry's, where they were regaled with a good dinner, and a council of war was held. It was unanimously agreed that nothing could be done until the whereabouts of Roder and his men could be ascertained, and the man gradually dropped off and returned to their respective homes, with the exception of a few who chose to remain a the gue to of Colonel Landry.

It was just at sunset that Rose, who was sitting at a window, looking at the blaze of glory in which the sun was going down, descried a body of horsemen approaching from the north-west. Won lering who could be coming from that direction, toward the rear of the house, she watched them closely, and soon discovered that they were Indians.

She hastened to give the alarm, which brought all in the house to look at the horsemen, and it was considered certain that they were Indians, unless they might be Roler's men in disguise. At all events they must be enemies, and proparations were at once made to receive them as such.

There were six fighting-men in the house, including the negroes, and there were just arms enough in the house for those six, including two shot-guns. But those six could make but a poor defense against twenty men, and the house was so built that it was not easy of defense. It was no wonder that the men looked blank at the prospect before them, although they had led their weapons resolutely, and took their stations with alacrity.

"Perhaps one of them may have a black arrow on his arm," suggested Rose, to whom this bright idea had suddenly presented itself.

"You are a little goose," replied Warner. "It was no Indian who rescaed you. It was Nat Whetstone."

"But he looked as much like an Indian as any of those, and I am sure it was an Indian who was with him. Whet-stone called him Ne-cum-wa, as I remember well, and you know that that is not a white man's name."

"It will be a strange thing if you are right. In fact, this is a strange business at the best, and I must confess that I can't see through it."

" For my part, I don't feel the least bit afrail."

There was no chance for any farther speculation, as the Indians stopped as soon as they came within ride range of the lio se, and one of them role forward alone.

Of course no one was going to fire at this solitary horson in and he came unmolested to the house, where it was son proved that Rose's supposition was correct.

"Where do you come from, and who are those men?" hastily inquired George Wunter.

"They are my friends and yours," replied Whetstone. "This house is to be attacked, and I am surprised that the attack has not been made already."

"Who is to attack us?" ....

"I have no time to answer questions. Let me bring in my men, if you want our help. We have been riding hard since daylight, to get ahead of those people, and our horses are broke down."

One or two men wanted to parley before admitting a crowd of savages to the house; but George Warner's impetuosity overcame all opposition, and he at once directed Whetstone to bring up his allies. They came at the sound of his whistle, and car rly filed into the house, after securing their horses in the outbuilding.

Reservois and gestures, and their eager, hungry eyes, that seemed anxious to cat up every thing on the place; although they were only betraying a curiosity which they could not help, and which would show itself through their stolid demeanor.

It was strange, indeed, to see those savages brought into the horse of a white man, to defend him against the attack of other white mon, and many comments were made upon such an anomalous condition of affairs; but Whetstone had no time to listen to comments or to give explanations. He mentioned, as hastily as possible, the attack upon the caravan, and the manner in which he had learned that Colonel Landry's house was to be assailed, and suggested that no time should be lost in a tring assistance. His suggestions were at once adopted. Two men were sent out, on swift horses, to inform the members of the vigilince committee of the expected attack, and sentingly were posted in positions that commanded the best view, to give timely notice of the approach of the expected marranders.

In the mean tine Mrs. Landry and her servants were busily engaged in preparing a meal to satisfy the appetites of their strang of factors, who are with such avidity when it was set to factors, as to put in the shade all previous performances in mastication that she had seen:

While his warriors were fer ling, Whatsome was pressed to give an account of his recent adventures, and to explain how he became connected with the Comanches; but his questioners did not succeed in cliciting much information, except in relation to the attack upon the caravan, which he described with more minuteness than was necessary.

When he had finished his account, there was a new excitement in the house, caused by the arrival of a man from the settlement, who stated that Paul Roler was there with a large crowd of men, some of whom were wounded, an i all of whom were drinking and noisily declaring that they intended to "cir an out" Colonel Landry's plantation and kill all who were connected with the vigilance committee. He had slipped away in the midst of the uproar, and had hastened to the house to give the occupants warning.

Thankful for this timely notice, Whetstone and his friends lost no time in making preparations to meet the desperate marauders, hoping to find an easy task in defeating them, at ter their hard usage in the attack on the caravan and their hard drinking at the settlement. Their hopes were still further raised by the arrival of the men from Ferguson's reach and an adjoining plantation, who hastened to Colonel Landry's as soon as they were informed of the threatened attack.

Captain Ferguson took command, as chairman of the vigilance committee, and placed Whetstone and his In lines in concealment behind the fence in front of the house, with instructions that they were to maintain perfect silence, and not to fire a gun until the enemy should be right upon them. After delivering their fire, they would remain where they were, or retreat to the house, as Whetstone should deem best. The white men and the regroes who had arms were stationed in the shrabbery, on each flank of their red allies.

While these preparations were being made at Colonel Landry's house, Roder and his men were a lyancing from March's Settlement in a very disorderly manner.

When they reached the settlement, on their return from their disastrous expedition, there were plenty to tell them of the grand attempt and failure of the vigilance committee. This intelligence, coming at a time when they were in a very bid humor, made them angry enough, although they highed heartily at their foes, and vowed that the vigilants would never have thought of coming to look for them, if it had not been well known that they were absent from the settlement. However, it was an insult that should not go unpunished, and they were more set than ever in their determination to go to Colonel Landry's plantation and "clean it out."

St. Clair, who was expected to be the chief gainer by the rail, threw open his "saloon" to his friends, determined that they should not lack artificial courage to spur them up to the und raking. They were informed by the loafers who assisted them to dispose of the free whisky that the vigilants had separated and gone to their homes, leaving them, as they believed, a fair field for their operations.

Roder and his men all drank entirely too much of St. Clair's free whisky. They were greatly mortified and exasperated by their recent defeat. They had lost many of their comrades, and it was plain to most of them, notwithstanding their laughing and blasting, that a longer stay in that section of country would not be healthy for them. They were determined to strike one more blow, for revenge, before trying the effect of a change of air. Therefore it was that they prolonged their carons until some of them hardly knew, when they set out for Colonel Landry's plantation, whether they were walking on their heads or on their feet.

Roll rands some efforts to keep order among his boistercus followers, but soon abandoned them as useless, and the Bereimmalian crowd struggled on in the noisiest and most disorderly manner.

CHAPTER XV.

THE BLOW.

Turns were lights in Colonel Landry's windows when Roder and his men came in sight of the house. It was yet early, and the lights in licated that the family were at home, and had not yet ratical for the night. There was a prefound still-not yet ratical for the night. There was a prefound still-not about the place, and it seemed to Roder, who had succeeded in quieting his followers, that everything favored his purpose.

They had nearly reached the fonce, and were only about fifty yards from the house, when Roder stopped them and explained his plan. It was simple enough—after entering the gate they were to divide and surround the house.

"Come on, boys! The game is in our own hands," said St. Clair, as he laid his hands on the gate.

His words gave the signal for his death. Hardly had he spoken, when a dark line of men rose up behind the fence, and the fire of more than two dozen titles was poured into that huddled mass of men.

The effect of such a fire, at such close range, was terrible—it was murderous. It seemed that it must sweep Roder's gang at once into eternity, and it was near doing so. As an organization—a reckless, desperate organization of outlaws—Roder's gang no longer existed. There were a number of men lying on the ground, some of them motionless, and others writhing and groaning. The few who were left on their feet were as much paralyzed by this sudden blow as if they had themselves been shot. at

They were not permitted to remain more than a moment in that position. A terrific yell aroused them from their stupor—such a yell as they had lately heard i suing from the same throats—a yell that lent to their feet the speed of fear—the war-whoop of the Comanches.

"That wretch is here with his red skins!" exclaimed Roder, as the dark figures threw themselves over the fence, to fini h their work with tomahawks and knives.

He dropped his gan, and turned to fly; but he had g ne only a few steps when he was knocked down by a tomahawk.

The savages, like wolves who have tasted blood, runed on in pursuit of the factives. No one sought to step them—no one tried to hinder them when they coelly appropriated the scalps of the fallen victims. Roder and his men had so long been the terror of the neighborhood, that there were note to object to any mans by which they might be swept from the face of the earth. They had come on a criminal errand, and it was flitting that they should then and there receive the panishment due to their crimes. Worse than savages, it was just that they should die by the hands of savages

Some of the white men, perhaps, would have littened to the cries for mercy of their terror-stricken enemies; but they kept in the backgroun I after the first murderous fire, leaving the work of extermination to their rel allies. The result was that but two or three escape I to tell the tale (if they ever close to tell it) of the destruction of Roler's gang, and not one of them was ever again seen near March's Settlement. A large seed in of country, by one terrible and sweeping act of venceance, was cleared of outlaws and brought under the control of order.

Nat Whiteham stopped a tall warrior as he was stooping to take the scalp of a man who was yet living.

"I chaim this man, Ne-cam wa," he said. "Let my brother leave him to me."

The chief nodded to his friend, and uttered his war-cry as labard dancy in pursuit of another victim.

What we called for help, and carried the man, who was no other than Paul Roder, into the house, where he was laid on the floor has usible, but still I reathing.

In the course of time the red warriors returned from the pursuit, and came to the house with dripping scalps in their less. Their ensangined appearance frightened Rose Landry and her in ther, as well as the servants; but these savages but savel them, in all probability, from a great calamity, and grather be empelled them to conceal their disgust.

"What shall we do with these Indians?" asked Mrs. Landry, who could not belp shubbering as she looked at them.

"Is a nothing for it, maken, but to give them something to est and drink," replied Whatstone, as the good lady bustled to est and drink," realist conforts for these frightful friends.

A number of members of the vigil nee committee, who lead to nevial 1 by the two conviers, had arrived by this it of an isometrically asterial ed to learn that their work had to not as well as to see the strong allies by whose aid it had been applished. They overwhelmed Whotstone with their and the das, and strongly in isted that he should tell than how he had been competed with the Communches, and then how he had been competed with the Communches, and he had seed 1 in bringing them so far from their teach of any on such an errand.

"You do nally owe us an explanation," said George Warner. "There are several points about this affair that I can not possibly understand, and I will not be satisfied unless you clear them up. You know that we are your friends, and I am sure you have nothing to tell that would make us unfriendly."

Rose insised upon an explanation, also, protesting that she had a right to know all about her preserver, and Whetstone, with a troubled look, supposed that he would be obliged to comply with their wishes.

"But you owe me no thanks," he said. "What I have done was to serve my own ends. It is Ne-cum-wa who brought his warriors to help you. I am a Comanche, too; but I am a small chief, while Ne-cum-wa is a great chief."

"Black Arrow is my brother," said Ne-cum-wa, whose words his friend was obliged to translate. "He saved the life of Ne-cum-wa, and his brother is always ready to help him."

"But Ne-cum-wa's people saved my life," added Whetstone, and I only paid them what I owed them."

" Ben Blood !"

It was Paul Reder who spoke. He had recovered his senses, had raised himself on his arm, and was glaring wildly about the room.

"What do you want?" asked Warner. "Whom are you calling?"

"Nat Whetstone, Black Arrow, or whatever you may call him. Ben Blood is his name, and I want him to come here."

Ben Blood stepped up to where the wounded outlaw was lying, and looked at him rather compassionately.

"You've got me at last," said Roder, "and much good may it do you. It was you, then, and not your ghost, who came to the cabin and asked for your scalp?"

"It was no ghost."

"And it was you who put the black arrows into our men, and turned loose that ral. I don't blame you; but I wish I had found you cut a fittle sooner. I reckon you're satisfied now, and you're welcome to that seulp."

Those were the last words that Paul Roder spoke. The Commanches, by Whetstone's direction, carried the body out of the house, and it might have been noticed that one of them soon had a fresh scalp at his belt.

George Warner was overjoyed. "I have found my brother," he said, as he took Ben's hand in both of his "and I will try

I know there was something, Ben, that drew me to you when I met you at the settlement, and I felt that I could trust you, when some of our friends were suspicious. But I don't understand what Refer meant when he said that you had come and asked for your scalp. I noticed once—the night you slept here—that you—can it be possible?"

"Dil you notice that I had no scalp? Roler's men had it, and it is no won ler that they thought my ghost had come to claim it. It is a long story, and too painful for Miss Rose to hear; but you may know more about it some day. They took my scaip, and left me to die. The scalp is now nailed to the wall in my all hat in the timber; but I lived without it. I don't has we have it was that I livel; I don't know any thing that happared for a long time; but I know that I was miles from that place when I woke up and found a lot of red skins around no, some of Ne cum-wa's people. They couldn't take my scrip, as there was none for them to take; but they might have left me to die. I don't know why it was that they took care of me. It was like my living after what I had gone through with, I'r ckon-one of those strange things that will him a semetimes, just to make people wonder. But they did take care of me, and carried me to their lodges. Some of their women folks nursed me, and I got well and stro g. I was as rt of a slave among them for a while; but I happene l to save the life of Necum-wa, one of their chiefs, and then I I to the to show what I could do. They took a liking to me, and I became a chief-a little chief-not a big chief 11. 2 Nec 111 W.L.

Perhaps it was been use of living with those wild and reversiful part — prhaps it was just the old Adam that I used to hear the proachers talk about — anyhow, I got to longing to considewn here and take my revenge out of the men who had served interest. I thought about it until I had every thing plant I cut, and it looked easy. All I needed was help, and Necum was was really to follow me wherever I wanted to go. We toke twenty warriors, and hid them in a place that I knew of, while I looked about and did a little work on my own hold. I must confess that the warriors were getting right impatent, and they would have left me, I believe, except Necum-wa, if I hadn't given them a chance to take some scalps. That affair of the train came off just in time, and this work followed it. I reckon they are pretty well satisfied, and that they will do some tall bragging over their white scalps when they get back to their people. But they came mighty near missing those chances, when I put my head into the noose over at Captain Ferguson's?" A second over a contract of the scalps when I put my head into the noose over a captain Ferguson's?" A second over a captain Ferguson's ?" A second

"Why did you do that?" asked George. "I do believe you would have let them hang you, if I hadn't begged you so hard."

"Life was worth nothing to me just then, George. I had had enough of revenge, and was sick of it. It wasn't near as sweet a mess as I had thought it would be, when I was off among the Comanches. Then, again, I was sure, if I lived, I would have to tell you before long who I was, and I didn't want to do that."

"Why not?".

"Because-hark! Don't you hear wagons?"

Yes; George heard wagons, and others heard them, and in a few moments the train that had been attacked by Roder's men came rumbling up in front of the house.

CHAPTER XVI.

CONCLUSION.

The few words that Black Arrow, or Ben Blood, had stepped to speak to Tom Bulkley, before he hastened away from the ciravan, were concerning the intelligence that Jim Buker had just communicated to him. He also gave the direction and distance of March's Settlement and Colonel Landry's plantation.

Bulkley, who was always really to help those who helped him, and who was anxious to reach the very place that lead been described to him, put his cattle to the wagons, and start it westward as soon as the condition of his wounded friends would allow.

But ox teams travel slowly, and the day was past, and the night was far a lyanced, when he came in sight of March's Settl ment. Not caring to stop at that small collection of shortles, the train proced on in the light of the newly risent one, and it is a light of the newly risent.

Pro Bl. I showed so histories emotion when he learned that the constant had arrived, that his half-brother could not be produced him what was the matter.

"There is one thing I haven't told you," replied Ben "Miriam Boyd is with these wagons—she and John Wilson. They are married, I suppose. He was badly wounded, and she was helling his head when I left them."

"It don't follow from that that they are married. Suppose they are married; why should it trouble you? Do you still care for Marian?"

"Care for hor! I have never loved any woman but her, and I can't tell you how much I have always loved her. But should be not have always loved her. But

" Why should she hate you?"

Because I believed so shamefully when I stabbed John Wils n and run away. It is no wonder that she married him."

"If she hat you she has lately learnt how, and I don't bill we that she has married John Wilson. He made her an office of marriage has for II for the State; but she declined it, and her that he would have the offer open. There is now was a total of them Wilson."

Trues, which I have been such a value on h. I don't by her."

The part of the fine There she is, Goode, at the doce," In Bure you this file also cived a warm precising at Colonel Lee Ing at Goorge Warner, who was acquainted with most of them have a letter them into the house, where they were not surprised they were not surprised at the sight of the red-men, as they had expected to meet them here.

Three wounded men were brought in, and were at once provided with beds and attention.

"Are there no more?" asked Warner, as he came into the room after seeing that this business was properly attended to. "Where is John Wilson? I heard that he was bally wounded."

"He was very badly wounded," replied Miriam Boyd. "He died at noon. We are to bury him to-morrow, and it will be the saddest funeral I ever attended."

" He was a good man."

"He was a very good man. There are few who know how good he was. I never felt it, myself, until now. His death so overcomes me that I can think of nothing else."

She burst into a flood of tears, which put an end to conversation, and Mrs. Landry, declaring that her guests must be tired to death, hurried Miriam off to bed with the other women.

As for the men, there was not sleeping room for them all, and there were few of them, if any, who cared to sleep. The recent exciting events furnished abundant food for talk, and served to keep them thoroughly awake until morning, for which they had not long to wait.

"Did you notice how she was troubled at the death of John Wilson?" asked Ben Blood of George Warner.

"Who? Miriam Boyd? Yes; I noticed that. It was natural that she should feel sorry."

"Of course a woman will be sorry for the death of the man she loves, and she must have loved Wilson, whether he was her husband or not. You were sure that she would ask about me as soon as she saw you; but she did not mention my name."

"You heard her say that Wilson's death troubled her so that she could think of nothing else."

"I heard that well enough, and I know what it means, Ne cum-wa wid go to the north in the morning, and I will go with him."

"You will do no such thing I thought you were a brave man, but you seem to be a coward. You will go up-stairs.

and wash the paint off your face, and put on some of my clothes, and make yourself look like a white man."

"What's the use? With my scalp gone, and an eye out, she would hate to look at me."

Nevertheless, Ben grumblingly obeyed his half-brother, and it must be confessed that he took no little pains with his personal appearance. In the morning Miriam Boyd was visible at an early hour, notwithstanding the excitement and fatigue she had undergone. She at once sought George Warner, and had hardly bid him good-morning, when she began to make inquiries concerning Ben Blood.

"I have learned all about him," replied George. "I was bound to do so, on my own account, as well on yours. More than two years ago he fell a victim to the same gang of outlaws that attacked your train and this house."

"They murdered him?"

"They meant to do so, no doubt. They treated him with the greatest cruelty, and finished their work by depriving him of an eye and taking his scalp. They left him to die; but he lived, and ultimately fell into the hands of the Comanche Indians, who treated him kindly, and he became a chief among them."

"Were not those Comanche Indians who helped us when we were attacked—the same who are here now? The chief speaks the English language, and he seems to be a kind man, although he is so ugly. Perhaps he can tell me something of Ben."

"I do believe that he has been standing at the door listening to us. See! he has dressed himself like a white man."

Ben Blood came forward in a hesitating manner, and held Out his hands.

" Miriam I' he said, and she was in his arms. She had been true to him, during years of absence, and she was not likely to throw him off now.

George Warner left them there, and went in search of Rose. John Wilson was buried the next day, and there had been no funeral in that country at which there were truer mourners. On their return from the funeral, Ben Blood and Miriam, with their friends, were seated in Colonel Landry's house. The greater part of the guests had left, and the Indians were "camped" on the plantation.

"I want to know, Ben," said George, "what is to become of the Comanches. Ne-cum-wa expects you to return with him."

"I must," replied Ben, as his countenance suddenly fell.
"I promised him, and you know what an Indian is."

"Perhaps he can be bought off," suggested Bulkley. "Give him lots of presents."

"I have no presents to give him."

"You have plenty—wagon-loads of them. John Wilson left a will with me. He had no relations, and he gives all his property to Miriam. What is hers is yours, I suppose, or soon will be. Shall I take the responsibility, Miriam?"

Miriam gladly assented. Tom went to the wagons, and the Comanches were sent away rejoicing, although Ne-cum-wa exhibited more grief at parting with Black Arrow, than any one, except Ben Blood, would have given him credit for.

When this matter was settled, George Warner had another question ready for Ben.

"I want to know what you meant," he asked, "at a certain time when you had been standing on a barrel, by saying that it would have been better for you and for me if the barrel had been pushed from under you. Why would it have been better for me?"

"Because, if I had died, you would have had my mother's property."

thing of Ben."

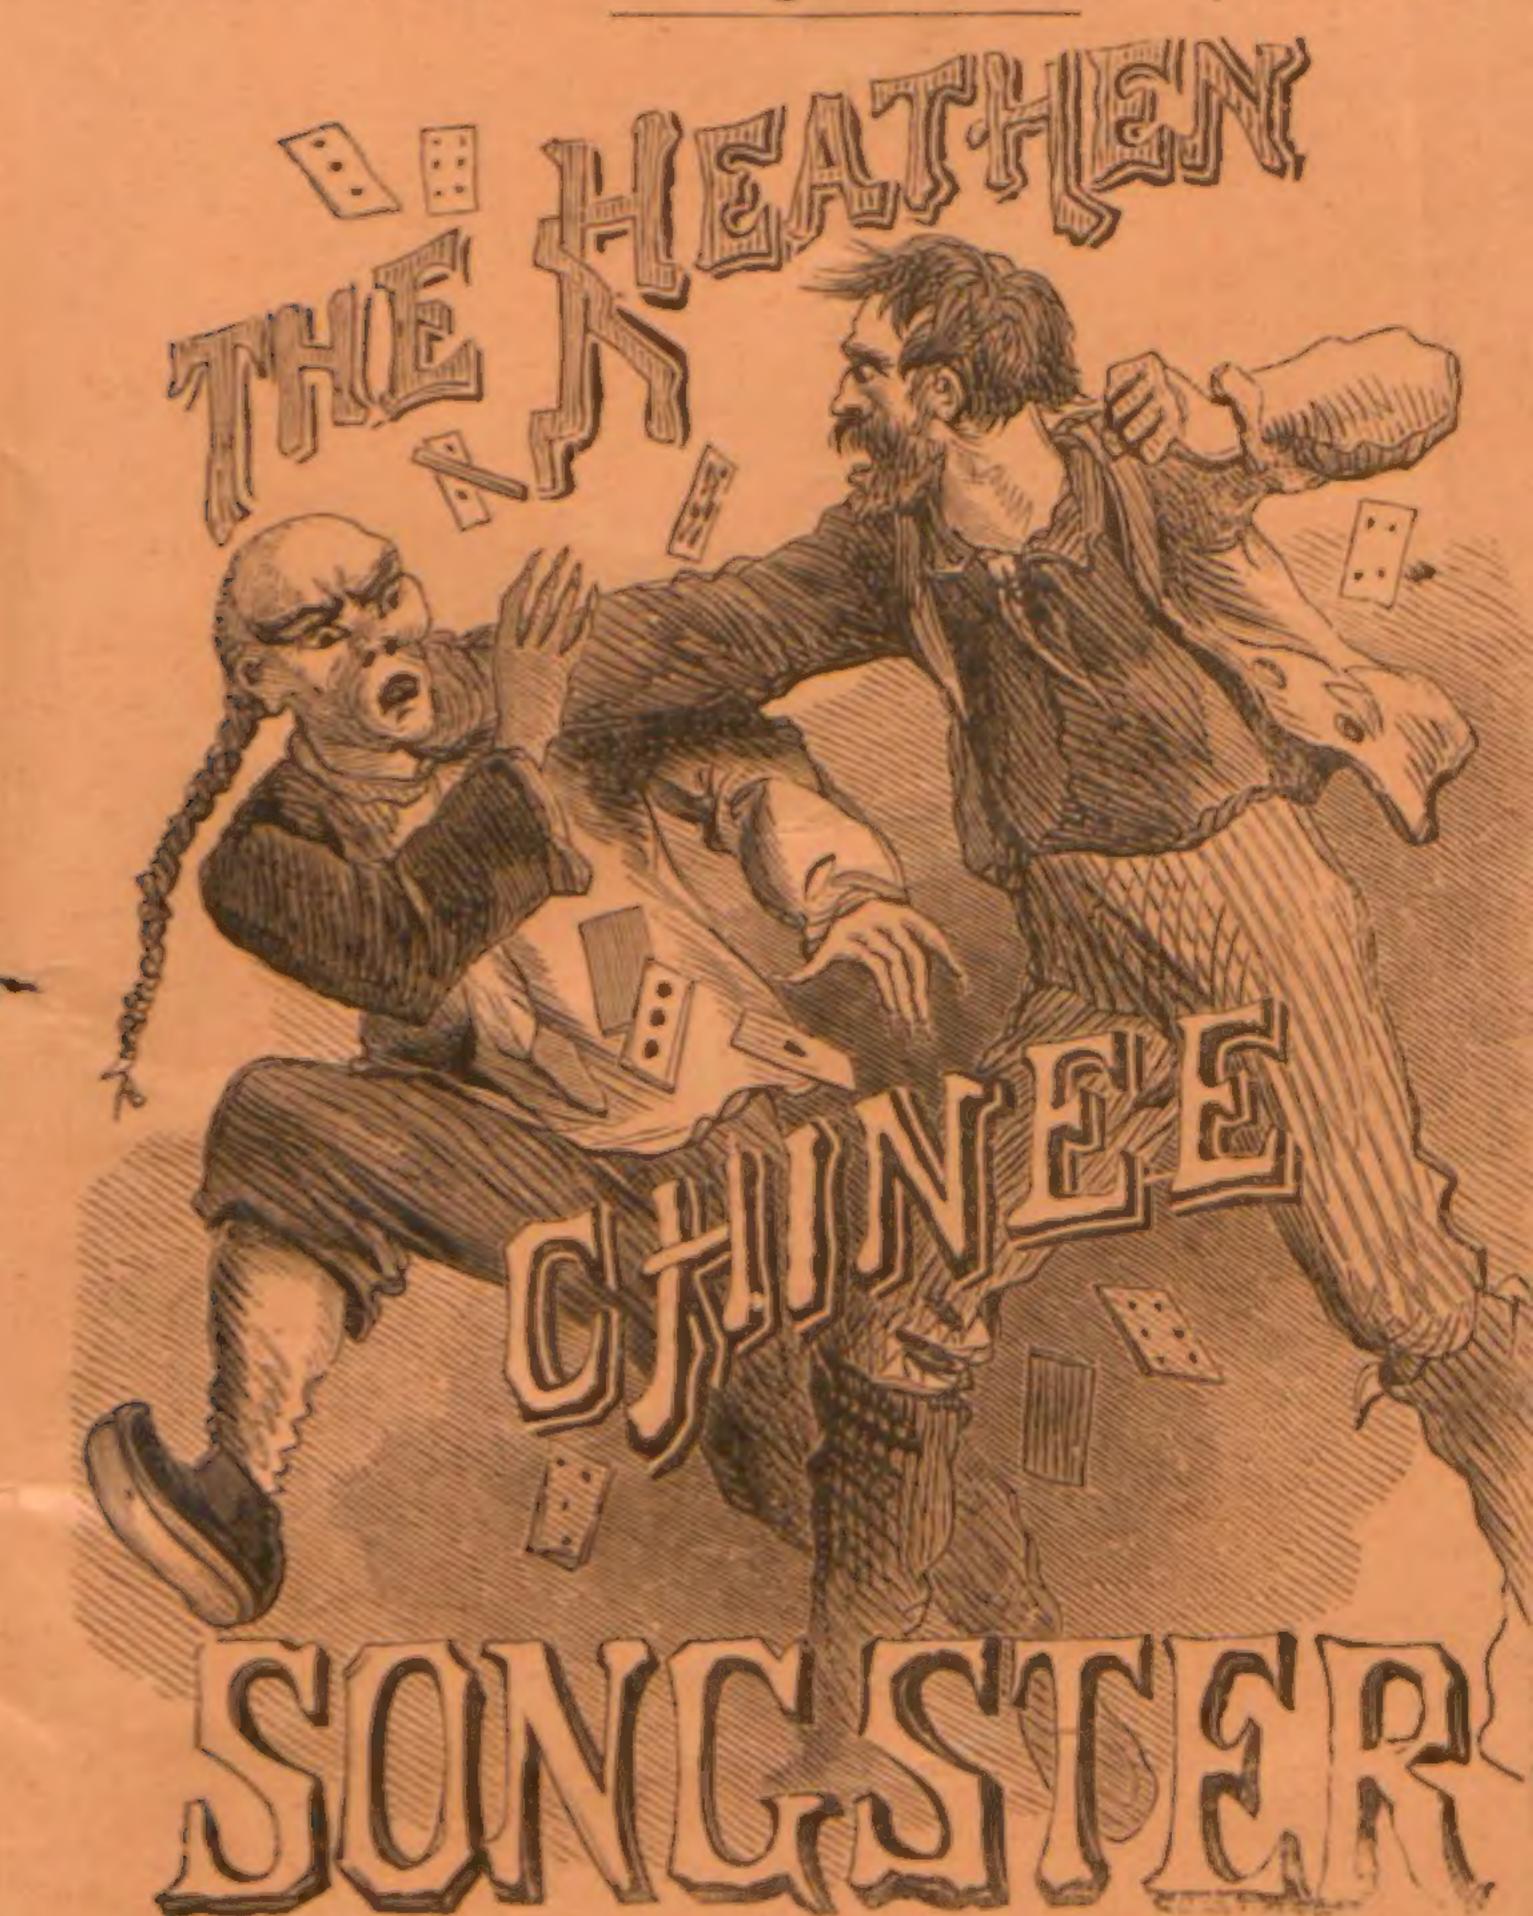

"I have enough without it."

Ben had enough, too. In due course of time he was married to Miriam Boyd, and became the proprietor of a large stock farm. George Warner married Rose Landry, and was one of the most extensive traders in northern Texas. Both were prosperous in their business and family relations. March's Settlement grew and flourished, and the days of outlaws were over. Charley St. Clair escaped to Galveston, where dissipation soon made an end of him; but Jim Baker was resolute in his determination to lead a new life, and became a quiet and respected citizen.

Discountification of the END.

their friends, were sended-in Colorestellanding's house their Beadle's Dime Song Book Series, No. 27.

A choice collection of the latest copyright songs, minstrel melodies, and popular ballads of the day, being the best productions of the favorite song writers Bret Harte, Will S. Hays, Henry C. Work, Dexter Smith, C. F. Shattuck, etc., etc.

For sale by all newsdealers; or sent, POST-PAID, to any address, on receipt of price—TEN CENTS.

BEADLE AND COMPANY, Publishers, 98 Wm. St., N. Y.

Beadle's Standard Dime Publications.

BEADLE AND COMPANY, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK.

Each volume 100 12mo, pages. Sent postage-paid, on receipt of price, ten cents each

Dime Novels 1. Malaeska. 2. The Privateer's Cruise. 3. Myra. 4. Alice Wilde.

5. The Golden Belt. 6. Chip, the Cave Child.

7. The Reefer of '76. S. Seth Jones. 9. The Slave Sculptor.

10. The Backwoods Bride. 11. Prisoner La Vintresse. 12. Bill Bidden, Trapper.

13. Cedar Swamp. 14. Emerald Neckbace. 15. The Frontier Augel. 16. Uncle Exchiel. 17. Mulge Wylde. 18. Nat Todd.

19. Massamil's Daughter. 20. Florida.

21. Sybil Chase. 22. The Malil of Esopus.

Winifred Winthrop. 24. The Trail Hauters. 25. The Pean Prince.

26. Brethren of the Const. Daughter of Liberty. 28. King Barnaby, 29. The Forest Spy. 30. Pot. Pomfret's Ward. 31. The Double Hero.

39. Iman. 38. Maun Guinea.* 34. Ruth Margerie.

35. East and West, 186. Ritlement of the Minmi. 37, Ginfladd, the Spy.

35. The Wrong Man. 39. The Land Claim. 40. Unioniat's Daughter.*

4). The Hunter's Cabin. 42. The King's Man.

43. The Allens. 44. Agnes Falkland. 43. Esther.

46. Wreck of the Albion. 47. Tim Bumble's Charge. 48. Quanton, the Haron.

49. The Gold Hunters. Lt. The Black Ship. 51. The Two Guarda. 52. Slugle Eye.

53. Hates and Loves, 54. Myrtie. 55. Off and Do. 56. Ahmo's Plot.

57. The Scout. 58. The Mad Hunter. 59. Kent, the Ranger. 60. Jo Daviese Clients 61. Laughing Eyes.

62. The Unknown. 61. The Indian Princess. 64. Rangers of Mohawk.

65. The Wrecker's Prize. ba. The Hunter's Yow. 67. Bullion Jim.

68, The Brigantine. 69. Black Hollow. 10. The Indian Queen. 21. The Lost Trail.

72, The Moose Hunters 73. The Silver Rughe,

75. The Hunter's Escape. 76. The Scout's Prize.

77. Quindaro. 7a. The Rival Scouts.

79. Schuylkiil Rangers. 80. Eagle Eye. 81. The Two Hunters.

82. The Mystic Came. 83. The Golden Harpoon. 84. The Seminole Chief.

85. The Fugitives 86, Red Plume. 87. On the Deep. 83. Captain Molly. 69. Star Even.

90. Chat Away. The Lost Cache. 92. The Twin Scouts.

93. The Creole Sisters, 94. The Mad Skipper. 95. Eph Peters.

96. Little Moccasin, 97. The Doonnell Hanter. 98. Ruth Harband. 99. Overboard.

100, Karaibe.

101. Maid of Wyoming. 102. Henris Forever. 10%. Bly Foot, the Guide.

101. Guilty or Not Guilty. 105. The Man in Green. 106. Simple Phil.

107. The Paddler Spy. 108, The Lout Ship. 109. Kidnapped.

110. The Hidden Home. 111. The Shawness' For. 117. The Falcon Royer.

113, Rattlepate. 114. Ned Starling. 115. The Some of Liberty.

116. Port at Last. 117, The Mohogan Maiden.

118. The Water Walf. 119. The Five Champions. 120. The Hunchback. 121. Vailed Benefactrem.

122. Harden, the Ranger. 125. The Missing Bride. 124. Sainter's Scould

125. The Hunted Life. 126, Old Jupa. 197 Hald Engis. 198 The Gulch Minera. 122. Blackeyer.

130. Brave Heart. 131. Wrocker's Passetter. 132, OM Housett.

133. Yankee Epil. 134. Foul-weather Jack. 135. The Cherokee Chief. 136. The Indian-Bunters.

137. The Traitor Spy. 138. Tim, the Scout. 139. The Border Foes. 149. Sheet-Anchor Tom. 141. The Helpless Hand.

142. The Sagamore of Saco. 143. The Swamp Scout. 144, The Prairie Trappers. 145, The Mountainser.

146, Berder Bessle, 147. Maid of the Mountain. 121. The Blue Clipper.

74. Cruiser of Chempeake; 148. Outward Bound. 149. The Hunter's Pledge.

150. The Scalp-Hunters. 151. The Two Trails. 152. The Planter Pirate. 153. Mohawk Nat.

154. Rob Ruskin. 155. The White Squaw.*

156. The Quakeress Spy. 357. The Indian Avenger. 158, The Blue Anchor.

159. Snowbird.

160, The Swamp Rifles. 161. The Lake Rangers. 169. The Border Rivala. 163. Job Dean, Trapper.

164. The Glant Chief. 165. The Unseen Hand. 186. Red Skin's Pledge.

167. Shadow Jack, 168. The Silent Hunter. 169. The White Cance.

171. The Silent Slaver. 179. Despard, the Spy. 173. The Red Coyote. 174. Queen of the Woods. 175. The Prairie Riffes.

16. The Trader Spy. 177. The Pale-face Squaer. 178, The Prairie Bride. 179, The White Vulture.

180; Glant Pete, Patriot. 1 1, Old Ryle, the Trailer. 189. Jabez Hawk.

193. The Phantom Ship. 184. The Red Rider. ins, The Decotals Scourge. 186. The Red Scalper.

181, The Outlaws' Plot. 188. The Black Rover-189. The Yellow Chiel. 190. Phanton Horseman. 191. Red Slayer.

192. The Specter Shipper. 193. The Swamp Rhiers. 194. Graylock, the Guide. 195. The First Trail.

196. Eagle Plume. 197. Shawner Scous-188. Burt Bunker. 199, Red Outlaw.

200. Prairie Pathfinder. 201. White Serpent.

208. Phantom Foe. 200, Musked Guide-20st. Metamora. 205. The Gray Scalp.

206. Buckskin Hill. 207. The Buffalo-Trapper. 208, The Ocean Outlaw, 209. Scarred Engle. 210. Redlaw, Half-Breed.

III. The Quadroon Spy. 219. Silverspur.

214. The Forest Monster-215. Gid, Granger. 216. Red Bolt.

218. Squatter Dick.

217, Mountain Gid, 918, Indian Spy, 219. The Sciente Scouts,

220. The Mohays Captive,

Dime School Series.

1. American Speaker. 2. National Speaker. 3. Patriotic Speaker.

4 Comic Speaker. 5. Elecutionist.

6. Hamorous Speaker. 7. Standard Speaker. 8. Stump Speaker.

9. Juvenile Speaker. 10. Spread-Eagle Speaker.

11. Dime Debater. DIXLOGUES, Nos. 1 to 9. Melodist.

School Melodist.

Dime Hand-Books.

I. Letter-Writer. 2. Book of Etiquetta. 3. Book of Versea.

4. Book of Dreams. 5. Furtune-Teller.

170. The Border Avengers, 6. Lidies' Letter-Writer, 7. Lovers' Casket.

> Dime Game-Rooks, Buse-Ball Player for 1870. Curling and Shating.

Ball-room Compani- a. Book of Pedestrianism. Book of Croquet. Cricket and Fast-hel'. Ynchting and Rewing. Riding and Driving. Guide to Swimming. Chous Instructor.

Dime Blographics.

Garibald. 2. Duniel Boone.

3. Kit Carson.

4. Anthony Wayne. 5. David Cruckett.

6. Wintield Boots.

7. Pontinc. 8. John C. Fremont.

John Paul Jones. 10. Marquis de Lateyette.

11. Tecunoch. 12. George B. McClellan.

13. Parson Brownless, 14. Abraham Lincoln.

15. Ulymen S. Grapt. MEN OF THE TIME, 1, E. 2.

Dime Family Series.

L. Cook Book. 2. Recipe Book.

il. Housewille's Manual. 4. Family Physician.

5. Drawmahing, Millinery.

Dime Song Books. Song Books, Nos. 1 to 25. Pocket Semesters, I to 6.

Miscellaneous.

DIME FICTION, 1 to 9. DIME LIBRARY, I to the DIME TALES, NO. 2 to 72 BOOKS OF PUN, Nov. 1 to L. House that Jack Bullt. Robinson Crosse (Higgs d) Grant's Report Sherman's Report.

Novels marked with a star are double numbers, 200 pages. Price 20 cents-For sale by all Newedenlers ; or sent, reservant, in any neutress, on receipt of price, ten cents each.

BEADLE AND COMPANY, Publishers, 98 William St., N. Y.